"A State may not tax its own bonds which were exempt from taxation at the date of issue without impairing the obligation of contract. Nor is it possible for a State to repeal a statute granting such exemption.[10]

"The United States are not included within the constitutional prohibition which prevents States from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts;[11] but when the United States has entered into a contract which grants partial or complete exemption to holders of its own securities, these terms cannot honorably be repudiated.[12]

"Congress has the power to authorize any new loan in taxable or in tax-exempt bonds or to refund outstanding bonds at maturity in either manner. It has been strongly urged that this mode of taxing public bonds be employed rather than to resort to constitutional amendment, because no government ever ought to relinquish its power to issue tax-exempt bonds in great emergencies such as war.[13]

"Alexander Hamilton strongly opposed issuing taxable public bonds. In his report on public credit, 1795, he said the taxable bonds would cost more than they were worth.

"A tax-exempt bond finds ready market. It does not have to compete with industrial bonds. It is therefore issued at a lower rate of interest and sold relatively higher than taxable bonds. This difference in price and interest is believed by some to make up for more than the amount that would be collected in taxes. In fact, it is a tax collected at the source, from which there is no possible evasion or concealment and no cost of collection. Taxing Federal bonds would be a matter of taking money out of one pocket and putting it into another if the tax were perfectly administered and assessed and collected without cost. But the experience of the Treasury Department has been that there is considerable evasion of income taxes.

"The rate of interest on a taxable bond would have to be at least high enough to insure to the investor a profit over present tax rates. But in order to market taxable bonds they would have to bear a rate of interest to insure the investor against any possible increase in the tax rate, both Federal and State, during the life of the bond.[14]

"If any measure were taken to issue taxable Federal bonds while allowing the States to continue to issue exempt bonds, the Federal Government would be at a disadvantage in seeking a market for its securities.[15]

"If both Federal and State Governments cease to issue exempt bonds, as contemplated in several proposed amendments to the Constitution, the disadvantage would lie with the government having the larger outstanding issues, which would be a source of revenue to the lesser debtor without compensation to itself. In raising this point in opposition to taxable bonds, it is generally assumed that it will work a hardship upon State and local governments, which have a continuous burden of school and other construction, while the Federal debt may in normal times be expected gradually to diminish. Moreover, those States that have no income tax law would derive no revenue from the taxation of bonds. Local governments such as municipalities, school districts, drainage, and irrigation districts could never hope to derive any benefit from taxable bonds and at the same time they would bear the burden of meeting a high rate of interest on their own bonds. It has been said that the necessity of refunding bonds at the high rates necessary to market taxable bonds would leave half of the municipalities of the country bankrupt. It is not improbable that many public works would have to be abandoned.[16]

"The ability to issue tax-free bonds has enabled large municipalities to free their citizens from the exploitation of corrupt public-utilities corporations. To be deprived of the privilege of issuing tax-exempt bonds for such purposes might make municipal ownership of public utilities difficult or impossible. At any rate the private corporations have strongly favored curtailing the privilege of issuing tax-exempt bonds.[17] The fact that Federal farm-loan bonds were tax free lightened the burden of farm mortgages.[18] In the event of great disasters such as fire, flood, or earthquake, much of the success of reconstruction depends upon the economical administration of large loans.[19]

"Any attempt to issue taxable bonds would greatly disturb the market. The holders of present issues of exempt bonds would find their bonds enhanced in value.[20]

"Unless new issues were authorized, it would be a long time before any revenue would flow to the Treasury. On the contrary, there might be great loss of revenue by reason of the efforts of State and local governments to issue exempt bonds to meet their needs for several decades ahead during the interval when any proposed amendment were pending.[21] In estimating the revenue to be derived from taxable bonds, the fact that educational, charitable, and other institutions whose property is exempt from taxation are fairly large holders of Government bonds, must not be overlooked.[22]

"To prohibit further issues of tax-exempt bonds would work a hardship against the new States as compared with the old States which have had a hundred years in which to develop their resources with tax-exempt bonds.[23]

"The increased expenditures of State and local governments is not due to extravagance fostered by the privilege of issuing tax-free bonds. Few public works were undertaken during the World War and the increased cost of labor and materials after the war necessitated great expense to the local government.[24]

"The issue of taxable bonds would increase the tax burden of those citizens who are not bondholders. When bonds are tax exempt, the tax is paid by the bondholder. When bonds are taxable the added cost in interest and in collecting the tax and the loss due to concealment of bonds distributes a burden to all taxpayers."[25]

NATIONAL RECOVERY PROGRAM—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WHEELER

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] on the evening of January 6.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, President Roosevelt made good his promise to the American people to put 4,000,000 men to work under the C.W.A. program by December 15. The next step is to get them off the C.W.A. These workers must be transferred to industrial pay rolls before there can be sound prosperity.

Both the Civil and Public Works programs are predicated on the assumption that by putting buying power into the hands of those at the bottom of the economic heap, which includes unemployed workers and farmers, industry will be stimulated sufficiently to absorb these surplus workers into established enterprises. Whether the administration measures eventually will succeed in reemployment of men in legitimate industries remains to be seen.

The financial crisis now affecting the world cannot but constitute a starting point for future economic systems. The past cannot, nor should it, be revived. The monetary system which has endured up to the year 1929 has turned out to be a complete failure, and the crisis now crushing down the means of our existence—that is, commercial transactions, financial exchange, and production and consumption—is an inevitable consequence of the failure of the gold standard to which the international bankers and their satellites have been wedded. It would be madness to attempt to go back to the same old methods. The gold standard, as the sole basis for a currency and as the universal measure of values, is what brought the world down to its present state of exhaustion. The World War was nothing more than one of its consequences. Inflation, overproduction, and lack of markets, the disasters caused by the deflation and lack of confidence now taking place and prevailing, are likewise logical and unavoidable consequences. People may say what they will—the present acute depression is solely financial in origin; any other causes are merely secondary or concurrent.

We must leave the past behind us as an historical element and must now and in the future resort to the remodeling of systems we already know and to the application of new methods to a new economic organization; if this be not done and an attempt be made to uphold to the uttermost a structure so insecure, total collapse will become imminent and be irresistible.

For several years now I have been trying to arouse the American people to the dangerous competition from countries with depreciated currencies based on low-priced silver. I have tried in season and out of season to convince the American manufacturer and the American farmer that the depreciated currencies of our competitors in silver-using countries was a great handicap to American producers.

I have watched oriental countries capture our foreign textile markets and invade our home market because their lower production costs, due to their depreciated currencies and low-priced silver, enabled them to offer their goods at a price far below our cost of production.

When Japan went off the gold standard, the yen depreciated 60 percent. This lowered her production costs accordingly and gave her an advantage over gold-standard countries that soon manifested itself by a tremendous increase in her textile export trade.

I obtained the following figures from the United States Department of Commerce: In 1912 the number of cotton spindles in Japan was 2,177,000, and in 1932, 7,965,000. In 1912 Japan had 22,000 looms and in 1932 had 79,000. During this same 20-year period from 1912 to 1932 her exports of cotton goods increased as follows: Number of yards exported to China in 1912 was 168 million and in 1932, 194 million. This increase was not very great, due to the fact that China was also developing her textile industry during this same period of time. But let us see what happened in other countries.

In 1912 Japan exported to India 8 million square yards and in 1932, 645 million square yards. During this same period of 20 years her exports to East India increased from 2 million yards to 352 million yards, and to Egypt the increase was from 36 thousand yards to 195 million yards; in Australia the increase was from 3 million yards to 36 million yards; in the Philippines from 5 million yards to 21 million; and to South America from 76 thousand yards in 1912 to 27 million in 1932.

In China the number of spindles in 1915 was 1,009,000 and in 1932 had increased to 4,612,000, while during this same period the number of looms in China increased from 4,564 to 40,000, while the increase in the production of cotton yarn was about 225 million pounds in 1915 to about 933 million pounds in 1932, and her increase in the production of cotton cloth was from 50 million yards in 1915 to 800 million yards in 1932.

In India the increase in production in the textile industry was not as pronounced as in China or Japan, yet we have a considerable development. The number of spindles in India in 1912 was 6,464,000, and in 1932, 9,506,000; the number of looms was 89,000 in 1912, and 186,000 in 1932. The production of cotton yarn in India was 688,000,000 pounds in 1912, and in 1932, 1,016,000,000 pounds. The production of cotton cloth increased from 2,350,000,000 yards in 1912 to 4,670,000,000 yards in 1932.

During this same time American exports of cotton cloth decreased as follows: To British India from 13,748,000 yards in 1913 to only 2,048,000 yards in 1932; to China our exports decreased from 80,462,000 square yards in 1913 to 1,420,000 yards in 1932.

There are some so-called "economists" who claim that the demonetization of silver did not materially affect our foreign commerce because nations try to balance their imports with their exports. The fallacy of this is apparent when we study the above figures furnished by the Department of Commerce. No juggling of figures or economic theories can alter the fact that low production costs in the Orient are driving our textile manufacturers out of the world markets and threatening to capture our home market as well.

Because of the importance of this question of depreciated currency and the commercial advantage gained thereby, I wish to quote briefly some statements bearing on this phase of the problem.

Mr. H. D. Harriman, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, in a letter of December 16, 1932, points out the harmful effects upon our commerce of the depreciated currencies of other nations.

He writes: "Depreciated foreign currencies have been exerting an undermining influence upon our economic situation. First, by negativing our tariffs so that in our home markets American goods have been displaced, factory output cut down, and unemployment increased; second, by depressing price levels and preventing any upward price movement to a basis of fair return for American labor and capital * * *. Over half of the products coming into the United States are benefiting from the advantage of depreciated currencies. Over 20 foreign countries have that advantage in undercutting the prices of American products."

While Mr. Harriman undoubtedly had in mind depreciated currencies in European countries, the low price of silver means to silver-using countries the same thing as depreciated currencies in other countries.

President Roosevelt by his plan to purchase gold in the open market has corrected the advantage that Great Britain and other European countries had over the United States in the world market on account of their depreciated currencies, but nothing has thus far been done to correct the loss of our trade by reason of the depreciated currencies in silver-using countries.

Mr. Denny, one of the leading economists of Great Britain, has this to say: "In countries where silver is the currency, as for instance in China, where the drop in silver between the year 1926 and 1931 is approximately 50 percent, he would have to pay twice as much in his silver money as he would have done in 1926, or, expressed in goods, he would have to produce twice the quantity to pay for goods purchased in the United States.

"It will be seen at once, therefore, that the greater the departure of the currency of a country from the gold standard, the more difficult it becomes for that country to deal with another country which remains on it. Contrariwise, two countries which have both left it may find that their position relative to each other is practically unchanged, and naturally the tendency would be in such cases for those countries to deal with each other rather than with the gold-standard countries."

As a striking example of this fact appears the Associated Press dispatch in the Washington Star of January 4, 1934, to this effect:

"The United States may expect a restricted market for its raw cotton in Japan this year as a result of an Indo-Japanese commercial agreement obligating Japan to buy 1,500,000 bales of Indian raw cotton annually.

"This is in return for exportation of 400 million square yards of Japanese cotton textiles to India each year."

By reason of the depreciated currencies of Japan and China they are able to undersell the textile manufacturers of the United States on the one hand, and, on the other, they are able to buy their raw cotton in India at a cheaper price than it is possible for it to be produced in the United States. In this respect the loss falls not only on the textile manufacturer of this country but on the cotton farmer as well.

It has been argued on the floor of the Senate by those who have been opposed to the free coinage of both gold and silver at a definite fixed ratio that what we lost in manufactured products in the Orient we gained by the sale of our raw materials.

I have always contended that the low price of silver would not only increase the number of spindles in the manufacturing plants in the Orient but it would likewise force those countries into the production of raw materials, as they could not long afford to buy raw materials from a gold-standard country.

The President recognized this situation when he, by his silver proclamation, entered upon the policy of buying newly mined American silver; but the effect of that was not, I am sure, what the President expected it to be, because the purchase of newly mined silver could not and did not affect the world price of silver, and consequently did not affect the world price of commodities. The President's proclamation amounted only to giving a subsidy to the silver-mining companies of America for newly mined silver; but if you remonetized silver under my bill, you would not only increase the purchasing power of the people of silver-using countries but the value of all property in those countries in terms of money would increase many times.

Can you calculate what this would amount to if it happened in the United States? And then remember that the population of Asia, Mexico, and South America, silver-using countries, is nine times as great. Also ask yourself what the capital exports might amount to to develop these countries all in the shape of manufactures and construction material if silver, instead of fluctuating 50 percent a year in price as a commodity, were tied to gold at a ratio never again to change in value.

I can give you a striking example of what would happen. Between 1880 and 1890 all the railroads and many other works in Argentina were constructed with British capital, and this brought a wave of prosperity which culminated in a great boom in British railroad and industrial stocks in 1888 and 1889. Yet the population of Argentina at that time was only 6,000,000.

If this was the result of supplying the needs of 6,000,000 people, what might it be from supplying the needs of the 1,130,000,000, 200 times as many, of the silver-using countries? I am informed that the total exports to these countries in 1929 and 1930 were $1,250,000,000 and in 1931–32 they had shrunk to $490,000,000, which represents a paltry 44 cents a head for these 1,130,000,000 customers. I estimate that the purchases of these people would be many times what they are now.

It has been estimated by some that their purchases would be 100 times what they are today; but assume for the sake of argument that they were only 10 times, it would mean $5,000,000,000 coming into this country instead of the miserable present $490,000,000, which is all that can be squeezed from two thirds of the world, starved and reduced to misery by the actions of those who destroyed our silver and who today control the economic destinies of the world.

Not a week passes now without the announcement of further heavy expenditures to provide employment, which is piling up the burden on industries and on the taxpayers. This is becoming a most serious matter as you can see for yourself. If this situation continues to exist, it spells bankruptcy for many concerns and thus employment will further be displaced.

Why should we insist upon forcing these sacrifices on the American people? Why not let the people of the silver-using countries buy our products, take our working men off the dole, and reduce our tax burden to our own people, create a market for our surplus wheat, hogs, and cotton, and bring happiness and contentment to our people where misery stalks today?

I am interested in the remonetization of silver because it will help humanity; it will help bring us out of this debacle in which we find ourselves today; it will stabilize the currencies of the world and do away with the uncertainty caused by the fluctuation of the currencies that is taking place at this moment. Those who are advocating the rehabilitation of silver as a favored commodity, seem to overlook entirely the fact that silver must be monetized not to help some silver producer but to create more primary money upon which the credit structure of the world is based. In 1929 the world's credit structure tumbled because of the fact that there was not sufficient gold in the world to uphold this structure and because of its maldistribution. Unless you monetize silver, bank credits to any extent cannot be based on it. Remonetize it under my bill, and you not only double the purchasing power of the silver-using countries to the extent of the silver they have, but you increase their buying power many times because of the fact that credit can be then based upon silver money as well as gold. Remonetize silver, and you take our unemployed workers off the streets, off the C.W.A. rolls, and put them back into the industries of the country.

SUCCESS OF N.R.A. ACTIVITIES

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter signed by Oliver Cabana, Jr., president of the Liquid Veneer Corporation, of Buffalo, N.Y., setting forth his views as to the success of the activities of the N.R.A.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LIQUID VENEER CORPORATION,
Buffalo, N.Y., January 12, 1934.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: We are so strongly convinced that the N.R.A. is rapidly bringing about business recovery, as reflected in the reports from our salesmen and from other reliable sources, that we are circulating the enclosed pamphlet in all of the packages of goods shipped from our factories.

We expect in time to reach about 250,000 retailers, over 3,000 wholesalers, and a large number of consumers.

The evidences of recovery are so pronounced, the indications are so strong that the improvement is largely due to the N.R.A., and the plan is so well on its way, that we believe it would be a public calamity to impede it in any way at this time. We are all very much in favor of it, and we hope that your influence will be thrown strongly in favor of its continuation when occasion arises.

THE RECONSTRUCTION OF MONEY—ARTICLE BY WALTER LIPPMANN

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in the RECORD an article in today's New York Herald Tribune by the noted author, Walter Lippmann, based on President Roosevelt's monetary message of January 15, 1934.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 16, 1934]

TODAY AND TOMORROW—THE RECONSTRUCTION OF MONEY

By Walter Lippmann

The President's proposals contain so many technical implications that I do not feel able to discuss them after having had only a few hours to think about them. Offhand, it would appear, however, that what he has done is to keep himself uncommitted as to a permanent solution of the monetary problem, while taking two definite measures for the immediate management of the dollar.

The first of these measures aims at a tentative stabilization of the dollar within wide limits—between 50 and 60 cents gold. The second establishes an equalization fund to keep the dollar within those limits by buying and selling gold and foreign exchange. This fund is to come from the capture of the gold profit of the Federal Reserve System and the Treasury. The profit arises from the fact that the official price of gold is raised from about $20 an ounce to at least $34 an ounce.

The decision to use this fund from the gold profit primarily as an equalization fund, and not as a whole, at any rate, to finance the deficit, is in itself very important. If I interpret it correctly, this decision means that the President is not letting this great fund of three to four billions find its way into the banking system, where it would swell excess reserves to a point at which credit inflation would be difficult, if not impossible, to control.

So it may be said that the President is proceeding on the principle of keeping the dollar under control—externally by means of an equalization fund, internally by keeping the excess reserves of the banking system in a form and within limits where credit can be managed by the normal methods of credit expansion and contraction.

All of this, as the President makes clear, is only a step, and a tentative step at that, toward "an ultimate world-wide solution." That solution is not yet in sight. It may be useful, however, to attempt to state the nature of the problem which calls for solution.

The practical difficulties of restoring the international gold standard and the dangers of restoring it in its old form are perhaps not fully appreciated among those who look upon themselves as the guardians of sound money. Yet we have just witnessed the break-down of that standard less than 3 years after it had been reestablished, and it is difficult to see how responsible statesmen and financiers can advocate a second restoration until and unless they are reasonably certain that the causes of the recent break-down have been cured.

It is probably more difficult to restore the international gold standard today than it was in 1925. For since that time the bulk of the world's monetary gold has been accumulated and sterilized in three countries. There are about 23,000 tons of gold in the world, and about 18,000 of them are held in the United States, France, and Great Britain. Obviously, these three great gold-holding countries have got somehow to redistribute their gold if there is to be an international gold standard. How is this to be done? How are Japan and Germany and central Europe and South America and Australia and India to get enough of this gold to set up true gold currencies with gold reserves? Obviously no one in France, England, and America is going to present the Japanese and the Germans and the Argentineans and all the rest of them with their fair share of the world's small stock of gold. Nowhere does devotion to the gold standard go to the length of contemplating free gifts of gold to countries which lack it.

But if the gold is not given away, then those who lack gold must borrow it or must buy it. But who in London, Paris, or New York wants to lend gold to countries that lack it? The reason they have lost their gold is that they already owe more than they can pay. The only other way they could get gold is to buy it by exporting more goods than they import. They could do this by depreciating their currencies. But this would mean that Britain, France, and the United States would have to stand by and let their foreign trade be undercut by the debtor countries and their home markets flooded by cheap imports.

Political human nature will not stand that. Therefore the gold which is now cornered in these countries cannot be redistributed as a gift; it cannot be borrowed or bought by the debtor countries except by threatening the trade of the creditor countries.

Some observers, notably Mr. L. L. B. Angas in his extraordinarily interesting pamphlet on the Coming Collapse in Gold, have concluded that the practical difficulties of redistributing the gold and of keeping it distributed are insuperable. They prophesy the abandonment of gold and advocate the continuation permanently of what now exists in three quarters of the commercial world, that is, managed paper currencies. This is a conclusion which most men will be extremely reluctant to accept. The President has made it clear in his message that he does not accept it. For while it is indisputable that all modern currencies are, and necessarily must be, managed, it seems extremely dangerous, in view of the limitations of human wisdom and disinterestedness, not to have some metallic measure which restricts somewhat the discretion of those who manage money.

But anyone who is conservative enough to desire a metallic control of money must be bold enough to recognize that gold as it is now distributed and the gold standard as operated since the war offer no hope whatever. The basic reason is that while the gold standard controls national currencies this control is tolerable only if the gold standard itself is wisely and effectively managed. Before the war the single gold standard worked well from about 1896 to 1914. That was its best period. In that time there was a plentiful supply of new gold and the gold standard was well managed from London. Since the war nobody has managed the gold standard effectively or well, and there has been no great supply of new gold. The upshot is that most of the world is off the gold standard, and most of the gold of the world lies sterile in Paris, New York, and London.

The restoration of an international metallic standard would, therefore, seem to require two things. One is the breaking of what has been called the "corner in gold", that is to say a deliberate reduction of the value of gold so that those who have cornered it and hoarded it will wish to sell it, and so get it distributed. The other is the establishment of a method of holding the lowered value of gold steady so that nations returning to gold will not thereafter be subjected to violent deflations or violent inflations.

The real question for all monetary conservatives, among whom the President must clearly be included—for all who want metallic money and not completely managed paper money—is this: By what device can gold be made less valuable and its value then stabilized? For until gold itself is stabilized, no one who understands this question will wish to stabilize the dollar permanently on gold. Well, what is it that gives gold its value? Its beauty? In some measure. But there are more beautiful metals than gold. Its utility? It is not very useful. The chief reason why gold is so valuable is that in all the civilized countries of the West it can always be sold at a fixed price. When the mints are open nobody need fear that he cannot sell his gold. In other words, the greatest value of gold is due to the fact that it is legal money at a statutory price for a fixed quantity. This makes it a universal means of storing wealth. Without that, were gold demonetized as silver has been in the West, its value would fall to what people would pay for it to fill their teeth and to make jewelry and other industrial products.

If we do not wish to demonetize gold, but do wish to reduce its value and then regulate its value, it follows that we must do something to its monetary position. For it is its monetary position that gives gold its chief value by creating an unlimited demand. Now, to reduce the value of anything you have either to reduce the demand or increase the supply. To regulate its value you have to control effectively either the demand or the supply. But it is impossible to do very much about the demand, though some of the reformers think they can do something. The President seems to share their view in that he proposes to stop entirely the circulation of gold coins. This reduces demand, no doubt, but it does not control demand.

But the supply it may be possible to control because it is such a small supply. The two possible ways of controlling it are, first, by varying the gold content of currencies in each country, and, second, by reestablishing silver and treating it by law as an equivalent for gold. The first method is purely national. It would adjust the dollar to compensate for changes in the value of gold. The second method is international. It would adjust gold by compensating with silver for changes in its value.

The two methods are not exclusive. It is quite conceivable that the United States might take the lead in managing the value of gold by balancing it with silver in order to obtain reasonably stable international prices and also manage the dollar to govern the American price level in relation to those international prices.

I hope this does not open up vistas which are too alarming. My own conviction is that this is the ground we have immediately to explore if we are still conservative enough in monetary matters to prefer hard money at the base of credit to absolute paper money. From the point of view of the reconstruction of a gold standard, those who are exploring the possibilities of silver and of a variable gold content are the true conservatives. They alone are trying to find a middle road between the old gold standard, which is now impossible to restore, and the paper money system which is gaining ground so rapidly in the world.

THE ECONOMICS OF THE RECOVERY PROGRAM

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address delivered before the American Economics Association by a distinguished scholar, John Dickinson, who is now Assistant Secretary of Commerce, the subject of the speech being The Economics of the Recovery Program.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

For a practicing politician to present a paper before the American Economics Association is somewhat as if a garage mechanic were to present a paper before the American Physical Society. The analogy is not inapposite, even should the mechanic once have been a physicist, since the governmental administrator must, perforce, use the contributions of economic science always more or less crudely and in the rough, very much as the mechanic employs the conclusions of physics. None the less, he must employ them. At this stage of our social development economics forms the stuff and substance of politics. The problems with which Government for the moment is grappling are almost exclusively economic, even more than in a previous age they were predominantly religious. It is, therefore, not inappropriate, I suppose, that a governmental administrator should appear before a gathering like this and expose to the learned scrutiny of this audience some of the views and conclusions about economic matters which he believes to be governing him, or which he conceives to be guiding his colleagues at Washington.

I shall speak first about some general considerations which seem to me to underlie the whole policy of the administration and then confine myself to one or two special phases of the recovery program which have fallen directly under my own observation.

I

Any discussion of the economic policy of the administration must commence with certain general considerations, because that policy in some of its major aspects challenges at least the emphasis which has hitherto characterized a great deal of accepted economic doctrine. I say it challenges the emphasis, rather than the doctrine, because the corpus of economic doctrine itself, as it has been built up like a coral reef by the labors of innumerable contributors, is not subject to general but only to specific challenge.

There is one limiting feature of economic doctrine which is perhaps not so generally kept in mind as it should be, namely, that many of the particular doctrines which go to make it up have been devised at some time in the past to meet particular problems which at that time were pressing, and were accordingly devised with a special angle or slant which needs always to be read into the doctrine if it is to be properly understood. Again, economics, as a practical science, employing the terminology and dealing with the concerns of everyday life, has always tended, much more than the pure sciences, to absorb unconsciously, and to rely upon, presuppositions and points of view drawn from the contemporary intellectual atmosphere, and not specially isolated and identified. Finally, economics, as an observational science, deals with a constantly and rapidly changing subject matter; indeed, a subject matter which changes more rapidly than that of any other science. The starry heavens remain today almost exactly as they were when Copernicus observed them. The chemical elements have not changed since Lavoisier studied them. The existing species of plants and animals have suffered no considerable mutations since the days of Linnaeus and Cuvier. On the other hand, the entire mechanism of production and exchange and distribution which forms the subject matter of economics has undergone a practically complete transformation since the days of Adam Smith and even of Stuart Mill. Of course, no competent economist in his own thinking fails to make the necessary corrections and qualifications of economic doctrine which are required by these special limitations of the science. Every science, however, and particularly a practical science like economics, has a habit of throwing off an oversimplified popular image or stereotype of itself which responds much more slowly to change and correction than the technical science itself. This popularized stereotype of economics affects the thinking even of economists themselves more than they suppose. It is certain matters of emphasis in this generalized version of economics which the administration's program challenges, rather than the body of economic doctrine as such.

The prevailing stereotype of economic thinking has hitherto been built around a picture of a world consisting of a multitude of small independent units, each characterized by almost complete freedom of motion and whose interaction corresponded to certain statistical laws. The movement of the units in correspondence with these laws was thought to be of such a character as constantly to restore the whole system to equilibrium whenever any one tendency should chance for the time being to get out of balance with the rest. The normal effectiveness of the system to produce sufficient goods for the needs of the community and to distribute those goods equitably was therefore thought to depend primarily on the freedom of the individual units to act as the laws of economics assumed that they would act. A large number of individual men each buying what he individually wanted would call into action precisely the amount of labor, capital, and raw materials needed to supply those things. A recession of demand would cause a lowering of price which in turn would restore demand. An oversupply of capital would lower the rate of interest, decrease saving, and thus create a scarcity of capital which in turn would send the interest rate up. Human economic motives were supposed to be such that the economic system, if temporarily thrown out of balance, would right itself automatically.

The pre-established harmonies of popular economics—for the view I have been outlining cannot properly be charged against scientific economic theory in even its most classical form—presupposes and, as I have said, depends on a world of small independent units no one of which counts in the system for more than an element in a statistical average. It depends on the free appearance and disappearance of business units and their free entry into and withdrawal from the market. It depends on relatively stable habits of life, which cause the ebb and flow of substantially the same demands rather than the substitution of wholly new demands and the complete disappearance of old ones. It depends on a stable unit of value and exchange, and I rather think upon a stock of money which does not consist mainly of credit instruments. Apart from these conditioning factors there may be automatic laws of economic balance and adjustment, but they are not those on which the faith of rugged individualism has been upheld by its votaries. Hitherto we have been assuming that the conditioning facts of our economic theory corresponded to the facts of the real world. Now that we have had to face those facts, we observe divergencies in some major particulars.

In the first place the economic unit today is not the free mobile individual, the minute element in a statistical average—for all practical purposes it is the business concern, and as often as not the business concern is of very considerable size, and sometimes of mammoth size, binding together in a tight complex the interests of countless individuals, and tied in, through banks or otherwise, with many similar complexes. In some industries the effective business units are reduced to half a dozen or even a smaller number of giant enterprises. The behavior of such a business unit is by no means so free and mobile as that of the economic man of the old theory. Its managers, with the interests of an impersonal mass of investors, creditors, and employees at stake, cannot or do not act as an individual would. They cannot, for example, go out of business freely; to do so would involve abandoning plant and equipment which represents millions of dollars worth of savings. Often they cannot even withdraw from the market effectively because expensive plant eats itself up when idle and overhead must be met at all costs. The result is that in the face of slackened demand, production often continues in excessive quantities made possible by the financial strength of the contending units. Because of such financial strength they may be able to hold up prices with the result that their production accumulates in the form of mounting stocks which overhang the market ever more and more menacingly. On the other hand a vicious price war may result which drives prices for everybody below the cost of production, ruins not necessarily the marginal competitor but those with relatively weak financial staying power, and in the process shocks or shatters banks and the countless investors or depositors whose wealth has been tied into the industry. One of the necessary links in a system of automatic economic adjustments is the free disappearance of economic units. Under conditions today the prospect of toppling giants is so fraught with menace throughout the whole system that men shun automatic adjustments bought at such a price, and they do not occur at the time when they should if an automatic balance is to be maintained.

A second particular in which current conditions do not conform to the presuppositions of an automatic system of economic adjustments is closely connected, I believe, with the one to which I have just referred. Not only do the automatic adjustments not take place because the units have grown so large and hence are not mobile and flexible, but also because today practically all our economic activities have been drawn into the nexus of a highly organized industrial system without an elastic cushion to absorb the repercussions within the system. For example, 50 years ago our agriculture lay largely outside the industrial system—the farmers were self-supporting and did not depend for their livelihood on the conversion of their crops into money. A good deal of local industry and trade went on which was not tied into the national system by bank loans or other forms of financial dependence. Those areas of economic activity lying outside the organized system formed what may be compared to a cushion which operates to absorb much of the shock of the repercussions within the system. In idle times labor was absorbed into those outlying activities and in boom times the farms and local workshops increased their output. Today all our economic activity is geared into one system with vastly increased rigidity and with increased menace to the stability of the system. It is even being proposed to fund retail accounts payable and make them a basis for credits.

A third respect in which the facts no longer correspond to the presuppositions of a system of automatic economic adjustments relates to the changes which have taken place in our medium of exchange. Today, as is well known, our medium is largely bank credit circulating in the form of checks. Bank credit represents in the last analysis a hope, a prophecy of the future. It depends for its value on the value, or rather the prospective value, of the assets of enterprises on which the bank has loaned. The result of this is an interesting inversion, or perhaps I should say perversion, of the supposed operation of the law of supply and demand. When business is booming and values are rising bank credit increases and the increase in the stock of money which this implies raises prices still further and thus tends to stimulate rather than redress the process. In precisely the opposite way in a time of depression the value of bank assets and hence the volume of bank credit decreases, with the result that money becomes dear, prices continue to fall, funds available for buying decrease, and again the prevailing tendencies are enhanced rather than decreased.

I have only touched on a few of the characteristic features of our current economic situation which seem to me to explain in part why the old confidence in a system of automatic economic adjustment has disappointed us. They illustrate why deliberate conscious intervention in the system by governmental authority has become more than ever necessary. Of course, no system of purely automatic adjustments has ever prevailed. Government has always set the limiting conditions within which economic activity has gone on, has defined what transactions would be legally effective, has regulated weights and coinages, has supervised and controlled banking and finance. What we have recently been taught by the facts to recognize is that at various points our economic system may get completely out of balance and that if it is to be restored to proper working condition there must be the same kind of engineering attention given to it by conscious intelligence which is given to any system, mechanical or organic, that has gotten out of gear. The economic system is no supramundane system of pre-established harmonies which transcends human competence.

Of course, this is not to deny that there are economic sequences of cause and effect to which conscious action must conform if it is to produce its results, just as the chemist and the bridge builder and the engineer must conform to physical sequences of cause and effect if they wish to produce the results they aim for. There are forces of adjustment at work within the economic system just as in the human body natural forces of recovery are available to aid the efforts of the physician; otherwise no cure would ever be possible. The problem is always that of coordinating effort with the natural trends which effort must make use of. It is the old problem of art on the one hand and nature on the other. The two are correlative. We must in our thinking avoid so far as possible emotional swings of emphasis from one to the other.

It is important, I think, to note this need for balance in our thinking because some economists are today pointing out that certain of the more important maladjustments from which we are now suffering are in part the result of deliberate conscious action, of men's attempts to hold back the operation of economic forces and resist the adjustments in the direction of which those forces are tending. Thus they refer to the fact that in certain industries the manufacturing units have been sufficiently strong to resist a general tendency toward a decline in price with the result that sales volume has fallen off and a surplus of the product has accumulated which overhangs the market, while plants have closed down and workers have been laid off, results which would not have occurred had natural tendencies been permitted to work themselves out.

In the same way it is suggested that much conscious governmental interference with economic developments has operated to increase maladjustments rather than to correct them. Sir Arthur Salter, in his recent admirable little book on planning published under the title, "The Framework of an Ordered Society", refers, for example, to short-sighted tariff restrictions adopted under the pressure of groups which have not had the foresight to relate their own interests to the general interests of the community and to schemes such as the British rubber restriction plan and the plan for stimulating beet-sugar production in England.

Such instances of badly conceived planning afford no sound justification, I suggest, for taking refuge once more in the old theory of reliance on purely automatic adjustments. Such a course is a counsel of despair and rests upon a fundamental psychological pessimism which denies the ability of human beings to meet satisfactorily by their own efforts the problems of getting a living. It is precisely as if 150 years ago, because of the bad state of medical knowledge, men had been advised to abandon efforts to cure their ills by medical means and to trust exclusively to the unaided processes of nature.

II

The body of considerations which I have been so far advancing are addressed primarily to those economists who have taken the position that the administration should have trusted to "natural forces" to bring us out of the depression and should not have undertaken the various forms of stimulation and control which constitute the recovery program. I wish now to speak of two phases of that program—one, temporary and remedial in its objective, the other, permanent and preservative. I refer first to the various devices for the artificial stimulation of purchasing power and, secondly, to the substitution of a regulated for an unregulated competition.

The question of purchasing power in the national economy has in recent years been most frequently discussed in connection with the theory of excessive saving—the theory, in other words, which claims that too much of the annual income has been paid out in forms which divert it into channels of saving rather than into channels of consumption. The theoretical debate over this issue has been heated and there has been by no means a general acceptance of the excessive saving theory. There has been a tendency to interpret the administration's program for increasing purchasing power in terms of this controversy. Some of the economic criticis of the administration who believe that the arguments for diverting more income from saving into consumption are unsound have viewed with skepticism the administration's efforts as resting upon these arguments. In their own turn, these critics have suggested as recovery devices measures based on their belief that saving and the investment of saving promote sound economic activity. I submit that this interpretation of the campaign to increase purchasing power in terms of the controversy about the comparative merits of saving and consumption serves to obscure rather than clarify the recovery effort, and that a good deal of misunderstanding could be avoided if we approach the observation of that effort from a different point of view.

The situation with which the administration was confronted on taking office was marked by a progressive decline of production on the one hand and purchasing power on the other. Between February 1929 and February 1933 the production index had fallen for the textiles from 114 to 84, for lumber from 86 to 20, for iron and steel from 128 to 31, for automobiles from 143 to 33, carloadings had fallen to 53 percent of the normal, electric-power consumption to 62 percent of the normal, bituminous-coal production to 61 percent of the normal, and department-store sales to 49 percent of the 1923–25 average. Coupled with this progressive decline in production and trade there had been a progressive increase in unemployment until the total number of the unemployed had reached the figure of approximately 12 million. This was the situation. Obviously, if people were to be reemployed, industry must resume a more normal rate of production. On the other hand, if industry was to resume a more normal rate of production, it must find purchasers able and willing to buy its products.

At this juncture the consideration was advanced by many economists that as a matter of history recovery from past depressions has always been initiated by the opening up of new fields for profitable investment which stimulate the capital-goods industries, thereby reabsorbing the most considerable volume of the unemployed, who thus become purchasers of consumption goods. It was accordingly suggested that the proper line of procedure would be to devise some means whereby, either through increasing profits or through a vast public-works program or otherwise, the capital-goods industries which had naturally suffered most severely would again be set in motion and thus stimulate a demand for the products of the consumption-goods industries. The difficulty about this line of approach was that it was blocked by the existing fact situation before it could commence. In the past the opportunities for profitable investment which have initiated recovery from depressions have practically always been connected with the opening up of foreign markets. The opening to development of the United States, of South America, the Orient, and South Africa at different periods during the nineteenth century provided the conditions which governed recovery from the various nineteenth century depressions. Today there are still large undeveloped sections of the world, the opening up of which might, if other conditions permitted, afford a way out of the current depression along the lines of the past. But today there are two great obstacles which make it impossible to take advantage of these opportunities. The first is the international political situation, where tariff barriers and other restrictions on trade impose an insuperable obstacle to the speedy exploitation of foreign markets. The second is the accumulated mountain of indebtedness under which practically all foreign countries are laboring as a result partly of the destruction of wealth by the war and partly of the overstimulation of production and trade during the recent boom. It is sometimes stated that the "new frontier", whose exploitation offers the key to future prosperity, lies in the development of new demand at home through an increase in the standard of living. If this frontier is to be exploited, however, there must be presupposed on the part of the people a capacity to buy, and that capacity obviously did not and could not exist in the midst of general unemployment. The possibility of revival through the profitable exploitation of a frontier was thus excluded in both directions, nor could a program of public works of itself carry the burden of initiating recovery through a revival of capital-goods industries without being undertaken on so vast a scale as to be totally impracticable. The traditional avenues to recovery were thus blocked and brought to an impasse. The initiating force had to be sought in a different direction.

It was from this point of view, and for these reasons, that the administration had recourse to the policy of increasing the national purchasing power. It was obvious that if industrial production was to be increased, so that more people could be employed, the demand for the increased product must come from within the Nation. The great volume of purchasing power within the Nation comes from two classes—the farmers and the workers who are employed in production and distribution. If the pump was to be primed, if an impetus was to be given to start again the normal revolution of supply and demand, the only feasible device seemed to be by increasing the purchasing power of these two classes, and it is to this objective that the main effort of the administration has been directed through the two major agencies of the agricultural adjustment program and the industrial recovery program. Other relief measures of the administration have aimed in the same direction, such as the releasing of the frozen deposits in closed banks and the easing of the burden of indebtedness on farmers and home owners. The novel features of the program, however, are those connected with the agricultural and recovery acts.

The device adopted for increasing agricultural purchasing power has been primarily the reduction of agricultural production, coupled with the payment to the farmers of a sum derived from a tax on the processors of farm products. The device adopted for increasing the purchasing power of workers engaged in industry and distribution has been a shortening of hours, accompanied by the maintenance or increase of the wages paid to the individual worker, thereby increasing the number of workers employed and correspondingly increasing the total wage bill of the employers. Through both these channels it was expected that a greatly increased volume of funds would be made available for consumptive expenditures, and thus released into the channels of trade. This stimulation of the demand for the products of the consumption-goods industries would, it was hoped, make possible replacements and ultimately extensions in these industries which would reach back and stimulate the production-goods industries. Since this is inevitably a somewhat slow process, a program of public works on a considerable, but none the less practicable, scale was initiated to set in motion a recovery in the capital-goods industries in the interim.

The policies embodied in the agricultural adjustment program and the national recovery program have been viewed with a certain amount of skepticism by some economists for two reasons. The first is that the policy of reducing agricultural production is thought to rest upon a supposed state of overproduction, whereas many economists take the view that there cannot be overproduction in any true sense. Again, the policy under the Recovery Act of reducing the output of the individual worker by shortening hours for purely economic rather than social reasons has been criticized as an impediment to recovery. Both these criticisms rest upon a broad generalization—the generalization that the national well-being and the standard of living are, on the whole, directly proportional to the total quantity of goods produced. With this generalization, as a generalization, there can certainly be no quarrel, any more, for example, than with the corresponding political generalization that, on the whole, the greater the amount of freedom which the individuals of a nation possess, the greater is likely to be their happiness and the rate of national progress. The difficulty is that these generalizations are not formulae to be applied as rules of thumb to particular cases. While it may be true in a long-run sense that there can be no absolute overproduction, it is clear that in the case of a particular commodity at a particular time the quantity of production may be relatively so excessive as to paralyze the effective demand of the producers of that commodity for other commodities. Similarly, it may be true that under conditions of greatly depressed demand the product may be increased by so shortening the working hours of individual workers as to necessitate the employment of additional hands. The recovery program is obviously, so far as it relates to the features of it which we are now discussing, not intended as a permanent program for industry. It does not address itself to normal conditions or to the operation of normal tendencies. It aims to deal with maladjustments, and it is not to be expected that the measures which can deal effectively with maladjustments are those which would be appropriate for a system which was functioning normally.

If the validity of a program depends upon its results, the recovery program has certainly justified itself up to the present time. While there was a certain recession 6 or 7 weeks ago, apparently due to a somewhat too rapid anticipation of results, the upward movement has been resumed in most lines of activity, and there is a general feeling of optimism which is the indispensable prerequisite for sound economic advance.

III

I come, finally, to what many hope will be a permanent and lasting contribution of the National Industrial Recovery Act, namely, the substitution of a regulated for an unregulated competition. Through the codes of fair practice which the statute authorizes there is held out to industry, under the supervision of Government, the opportunity of taking cooperative action to civilize its competitive methods.

If the depression has taught us anything about the nature of the economic process, it has certainly shown us how the results of competition depends upon the types of competitive practices employed and upon the individual situation within which competition goes on. It has disclosed that, under the special conditions of modern industrial life and with the type of competitive practices which have widely prevailed, practically every one of the supposed beneficial checks and balances of competition, practically every one of the automatic adjustments which economic theory attributes to competition, may simply refuse to work. For example, under the operation of competition excessive production capacity has not withdrawn from the field leaving the market to the more efficient producers. On the contrary, excess capacity everywhere remains and diminished demand is merely reflected in a general reduction of operations among the producers all around. Inefficient producers have not ceased to operate but, on the contrary, it is often the inefficient producer who, by violating decent employment standards and underpaying his labor, as well as working them an excessive number of hours, is able to keep a larger percentage of his production capacity employed than some of his more fundamentally efficient rivals.

Under such circumstances it may well be that price has not been maintained at the point which will return the cost of production to all the producers still in the market. Obviously, this is impossible under conditions where high-cost and low-cost plants alike remain in the field to compete for a demand greatly below the amount of their combined capacity. Under such conditions competition, in the sense of unrestrained rivalry, far from amounting to a system of checks and balances and an agency of adjustment, suggests more accurately a continually descending spiral pointing through industrial anarchy toward ultimate destruction for everyone. Where all, or practically all, plants in the field are in distress and frankly reaching out for further business to employ their unused capacity, a given plant will often snatch at an order from a powerful buyer at a figure below the cost of production if it merely covers out-of-pocket expenses and contributes something, however little, toward overhead. The buyer who obtains such an advantage is placed in a favored position as compared with his competitors, and these at once swarm down on all the other producers with a clamorous demand to be given an equally favorable price. With a scarcity of buyers and a plethora of producers price, as a result of those practices, tends throughout the industry to be brought to a figure which not merely carries no return to the producer but frequently no adequate return to labor and to those who supply the raw materials. This situation exists today in many industries where the farmer who supplies the raw material of the industry and the laborers who work it up are not receiving an adequate return for their efforts, while the industry itself is so paralyzed that it does not afford a safe or attractive field for investment and its credit is destroyed. The mere fact that such a situation is accompanied by lower prices cannot be regarded from the standpoint of the public interest as in itself overbalancing the evils which it entails.

The sequence of events constituting the industrial rake's progress, which I have just described, is unfortunately not confined exclusively to the period of the present depression but tends to work itself out even in more normal times, because of certain special conditions of modern industry. These special conditions profoundly affected the operation of competition and no attempt to understand the place and effect which competition has in our present industrial life can afford to disregard them. They are connected primarily with two factors: First, the great size and expensiveness of the typical modern plant which employs all the most advanced and improved devices of machine technology, and, second, the practice of mass production, which makes impossible a very nice or close adjustment of plant capacity to demand and encourages plant building in anticipation of demand. The combined result of these two factors is to bring into existence plants laboring under the pressure of very heavy overhead costs and standing in a position of relatively unstable equilibrium with reference to the demand which they aim to supply. Consequently, whenever there is even a slight slackening down of demand, the pressure of overhead offers an almost irresistible temptation to the type of competitive practices which lead, for the industry as a whole, into the rake's progress which I have already described.

The usual stages in the progress are as follows: In order to meet the burden of overhead, there is always a strong temptation on the producer to step up volume by obtaining orders from particular customers at special low prices which, if offered to all customers, would put the plant in the red. If, however, additional business can be obtained by these orders from a few favored customers, it may seem to the plant management a good stroke of business to help in this way toward carrying the overhead. Inevitably, however, the granting of special prices in this way becomes noised about, pressure is brought to bear upon other producers to grant the same prices, customers who are in competition with the recipients of the special favors become dissatisfied, and the whole price structure slips down with jarring repercussions to levels which will not defray the production costs of all the producers remaining in the business.

It has been suggested in some quarters that competitive practices of the kind just mentioned, and leading to the industrial consequences which I have described, are among the causes of the depression. The depression has many causes, and almost every day a new one is being found for it, but, in my opinion, destructive competition cannot be set down as in any direct sense a major cause. However, there can be little doubt that with the depression upon us, and in our present situation, destructive competition has operated and is operating to retard recovery, and, on the contrary, to prolong and deepen the depression. And while I should certainly not include the evils of such competition as in any sense a major cause of the depression, I should certainly regard them as an important contributing factor in the general total situation which brought the depression on. The great obstacle under modern industrial conditions to the operation of competition as a beneficial system of checks and balances and automatic adjustments is the expensiveness combined with the permanence of our modern plant equipment. On the one hand, this leads inevitably to the building of plants by means of large-scale borrowed capital and, on the other hand, throws the most serious obstacles in the way of reducing the production capacity of an industry as a whole in a period of reduced demand. Where there are no obstacles to hinder resort to destructive competition through discrimination and discounts, the possibility of pursuing these practices holds out a delusive invitation to expansion and overbuilding. Since expansion and overbuilding in turn stimulate improper competitive practices of the kind described, we are presented with a vicious circle from which there is no escape, save by proper regulation and control of such competitive practices.

I submit that the proper regulation of competitive practices, especially practices relating to secret prices, price discrimination, discounts, and other types of discrimination, will do much toward eliminating forces and tendencies which in normal times, as in times of depression, tend to drag down and depress industry, lower the price of raw materials, and drive down labor standards. The elimination of these practices by bringing price into the open and rendering it subject to the normal operation of the law of supply and demand will tend to maintain a reasonably compensatory figure for all those producers whose output is essential to satisfy demand and will do much toward making it impossible for marginal producers who should be eliminated to survive and drag down their more efficient rivals. The problem of compensatory price, of price at least equal to cost of production, can, I believe, be trusted very largely to take care of itself where a condition of open and nondiscriminatory competition is scrupulously maintained.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA

Mr. SHEPPARD obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] the junior Senator from Texas will endeavor to secure the floor for the purpose of calling up and submitting the report of the Campaign Expenditures Committee with regard to conditions in Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] has stated that following the annual address of the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] on the eighteenth amendment he expects to address the Senate on the matter of the Louisiana senatorial election, which the special committee has had under investigation. I desire to give notice that following the remarks to be made by the junior Senator from Texas, in the event no other member of the committee desires to address the Senate on that subject, I desire to submit some remarks.

ALCOHOLIC-BEVERAGE REGULATION IN THE DISTRICT

Mr. KING. Mr. President, without desiring to prevent the able senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] and his colleague the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] taking the floor and delivering such addresses as they desire, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 213, the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

ANNIVERSARY OF ADOPTION OF EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, since my address to the Senate a year ago today on the eighteenth amendment that measure has been repealed.

On today, another anniversary of the eighteenth amendment, I rise to say that it will inevitably return.

In repealing temporarily the eighteenth amendment the American people demonstrated that at times propaganda is more powerful than principle in this Republic.

It is amazing that they surrendered so lightly the achievements of 13 years under Nation-wide prohibition—achievements such as a decrease in the death rate equaling a saving of 200,000 lives every year during the prohibition era; a decrease of at least two thirds in the consumption of intoxicating liquor as compared with the peak wet year of 1914; a decrease of 54 percent in the number of children brought to child-welfare associations on account of cruelty and neglect from drunken parents; a decrease by thousands in the number of special alcoholic wards in hospitals and sanitariums; the almost complete disappearance of institutions for the cure of alcoholism, such as Keely and Neal establishments; a decrease of at least 50 percent in arrests for prostitution throughout this Nation; a gain of 30 percent in the survival of infants under 1 year of age; a gain of 42 percent in the survival of children under 5 years of age; an unprecedented increase in savings and life insurance; and, above all, the abolition of the open saloon.

The repeal of the eighteenth amendment was equivalent to the placing of dynamite on our highways and in our streets and factories. It means the return to a national legal status of one of the most corrupt and corrupting agencies that ever dominated the public and private life of the Nation—the traffic in beverage liquor. It will bring drink-caused poverty, moral and physical degeneration, infinite unhappiness to millions of homes. It means the legal restoration, so far as national enactment is concerned, of a liquid poison, a habit-forming drug laden with disease and death for multitudes of people. It means the return of legalized saloons on an ever-growing scale, because States and communities now dry will find it increasingly difficult to resist the wet movement in view of the fact that the dry moorings in the National Constitution have been swept away—legalized saloons, those pits of hell that once lined our streets, pouring poison into the bodies of fathers and sons, throwing terror into the souls of mothers and daughters. You say that with prohibition we had the bootlegger and the speak-easy. Without prohibition we have the bootlegger, the speak-easy, and the public saloon. The legalized saloon alone, however, would be far more terrible than bootlegger and speak-easy combined. Without the public saloon and with Nation-wide prohibition we had secured a decline of at least two thirds in the consumption of liquor and were making distinct and encouraging progress throughout the Nation as a whole toward the reduction of liquor consumption to nominal proportions and toward the abolition of the speak-easy and the bootlegger.

No examination of more searching character was ever made than that of the Wickersham Commission into the workings of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act which enforced it. Unfortunately the reports of the special examiners of that Commission citing occurrences unfavorable to prohibition received far more publicity than reports of examiners containing data favorable to prohibition. This was due to the heavily financed wet propaganda, which was the prime cause of repeal. If half the publicity accorded the reports to the Wickersham Commission unfavorable to prohibition had been given to Evangeline Booth's report to that Commission giving the situation as she saw it, the eighteenth amendment would, in my judgment, be in operation today. The outstanding fact, is, however, that the Commission itself, comprised mainly of anti-drys or neutrals, recommended in its final report, after prolonged investigation and study, against the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, against the restoration in any manner of the legalized saloon, and against the return of light wines and beer.

The Wickersham Commission was more than justified in favoring the retention of the eighteenth amendment. A careful survey by the Prohibition Bureau of the United States Government, a survey praised by both wets and drys for the evidences it gave of accuracy and fairness, showed that if every possible source of the illegal production and sale of liquor had been fully utilized in 1930 and the quantity thus produced and sold had been entirely consumed, the volume consumed would not have been more than a third as great as that consumed in the peak wet year of 1914. It was by no means certain, however, that even this possible third had been actually produced or consumed. Be that as it may, the gratifying thing from the standpoint of prohibition is that at the rate of decrease shown by the Government survey, consumption of intoxicating liquor would have been reduced to unimportant proportions in this country within a generation if national prohibition had been permitted to continue. In answer to the wet claim that drinking among young people increased under prohibition, let it be said that a survey for the Wickersham Commission, made after 10 years of national prohibition, by C. W. Crabtree, of the National Education Association, showed that it had been decreasing. A questionnaire by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union about the same time covering 257 colleges in 45 States showed diminished drinking among collegians.

It is true that arrests for drunkenness increased under prohibition, but this does not mean that drinking increased. Arrests for drunkenness were made on a far stricter basis after the enactment of national prohibition. Before prohibition an intoxicated person, as a rule, was not arrested if not actually disturbing the peace or if not endangering his own safety or the safety of others. After prohibition far stricter standards governed arrests for intoxication, and many police departments issued instructions for the arrest of anyone involved in traffic-law violation who had the odor of liquor on his breath. It has been said by police chiefs that if the same rules governing arrests for intoxication had been followed before the enactment of prohibition there would have been 10 times more arrests before prohibition than would have been the case during prohibition.

from preprohibition times. Evidently they did not exist in sufficient numbers to halt the decline in liquor consumption and if prohibition had been allowed to continue, they would have diminished throughout the Nation as drinking diminished. The concentration of speak-easies in certain large centers and drinking in social and other circles holding the spotlight of publicity gave the wrong impression as to conditions in the country at large.

It is astounding that the American people, under the influence of the most deceptive propaganda the world has ever known, voted to repeal the eighteenth amendment in the face of the fact that every alternative method for the regulation and control of the liquor industry and traffic had been tried in various States before the advent of Nation-wide prohibition and found wanting. Each of these methods, such as various forms of taxation, high license, local option, State-wide prohibition, State ownership and operation, regulation of all kinds, including regulation as to time and place of sale, regulation as to sales on Sunday and to children, interstate action by the Federal Government for attempted protection of dry States, was tried and found inadequate to cope with the all-powerful, all-dominant liquor industry and traffic. The American people will be compelled to learn again at the expense of unmeasured loss and sorrow that the most effective way of handling the liquor traffic, even admitting that it cannot entirely be destroyed, is through Nation-wide prohibition, complete and unqualified.

The increased use of fast-moving trains, the growing number of automobiles, the rapid improvement of our highways, made it impossible in preprohibition times to protect dry States from greedy and conscienceless liquor interests in wet States. And yet we were told in the repeal campaign of 1933 that the dry States would be protected in the event of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Indeed, the second section of the twenty-first amendment, the amendment which succeeded the eighteenth, provides that the transportation of intoxicating liquors into dry States is prohibited, a provision which experience has shown to be futile and ineffective. Prior to 1920, the year Nation-wide prohibition was adopted, Congress had repeatedly attempted under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution to protect dry States from the flow of liquor from wet States. Congress was unable to stem that tide. Thirty-three States had State-wide prohibition laws when the eighteenth amendment went into effect. It was the imperative need of national power to prohibit the manufacture and sale of liquor anywhere in the Union for the protection of dry States and localities containing a majority of the American people that constituted one of the principal reasons for the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. It will constitute one of the principal reasons for its reenactment. The American people in 1933 forgot the sad experiences with interstate liquor in preprohibition eras and were led to believe that this impotent section in the new amendment could protect dry States. It could not be done before national prohibition when we had a population of only 105,000,000, only 9,000,000 motor vehicles, only 387,000 miles of surfaced roads, only 377,000 miles of train trackage, and when the airplane was still in a primary stage of development. How it could be done today with a population of more than 122,000,000, 693,000 miles of surfaced roads, 407,000 miles of train trackage, and more than 10,000 licensed and identified airplanes challenges reason.

Let us examine some of the forces behind the movement for repeal. It is evident that a group of millionaires aided in financing this movement in order that liquor taxes exacted from the consuming masses might modify the tax burdens which otherwise would be carried by the rich. The United States lobby investigation of 1930 revealed to the public the activities and correspondence of the Association Against the Eighteenth Amendment, showing that in 1928 and 1929, 53 millionaires contributed between 65 and 75 percent of the funds of the association, or a total of $276,240 in 1928 and $321,000 in 1929; that in the first 2 months of 1930, $127,500 was contributed to this association by about a dozen millionaires.

In a memorandum of the association printed in the official record of this investigation, the purpose of shifting millionaire and corporation taxes to the working masses, who become the principal consumers of intoxicating liquor in eras of the open saloon, is expressly stated. In this memorandum, which was the draft of a letter to prospective members, appears the following:

> Do you realize that Congress has power to at once legalize a glass of mild, wholesome beer? And that working men and others would willingly pay a tax of 3 cents per glass, and that that amount (based on past consumption) would enable the Federal Government to get rid of the burdensome corporation taxes and income taxes, and to take the snoopers and spies out of office?

Then follows a request to join and contribute.

W. H. Stayton, chairman of the board of directors of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, in a memorandum of October 8, 1927, according to the record of this investigation, indicated the importance to the millionaire of the income-tax argument for repeal of the eighteenth amendment when he wrote the following:

> I suggest that you consider whether it would be wise if you would ask a person to give us 1 percent of what he pays for income tax and then give him a little income-tax argument a la Murphy plan.

It appeared further in this investigation that Mr. Stayton wrote another memorandum in which these words appeared:

> I have selected by hand-picked method the names of about 2,000 men who pay income taxes on incomes of $100,000 or more each. These men are not members of the association and I do not know their attitude as to prohibition. My thought is to solicit them for sums which will average, say, about $200 for each contributor.

This Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, with contributors representing, according to the writings of the chairman of the board, $40,000,000,000 in wealth and controlling 3,000,000 employees, was one of the principal instruments through which the American people were propagandized for repeal and for nullification by bringing back beer in advance of repeal.

But for this millionaire propaganda it may well be doubted whether the movement against the eighteenth amendment would have had any success whatever.

These propagandists did not tell the people that they wanted liquor back because liquor taxes, absorbed by the working millions, would save the rich from higher corporation and income levies. No! They spread misrepresentations as to extent of drinking, drunkenness, lack of law enforcement, corruption, and crime so constantly and to such a degree that the American mind became hopelessly saturated with false conceptions on the subject of prohibition.

I have already dealt with the questions of drinking and drunkenness under prohibition.

As to crime, the fact is that the criminal ratio did not increase in the United States under prohibition. August Vollmer, formerly chief of police of Berkeley, Calif., and now or recently criminologist of the University of Chicago, asserted in 1929 that, according to available statistics, the criminal population was proportionately the same as it had been at any time in the past 50 years, and that the proportion of crime was about the same. The fact that despite the chaotic conditions following the World War, the reaction against established beliefs and standards pervading every part of this Republic, the waves of lawlessness that threatened to engulf this country and the world crime did not increase in proportion to population in this country during the decade succeeding the arrival of the eighteenth amendment is overwhelming evidence of the moral power and civilizing effect of prohibition.

The organized liquor tacticians based one of their principal contentions on alleged nonenforcement. Take the official figures for 1932, a fairly typical dry year. Prohibition cases to the number of 90,217 were prosecuted in the Federal courts, with 61,383 convictions. Such cases to the number of 13,847 were handled in State courts, with 11,980 convictions. Could this be called a status of nonenforcement?

The rum ballyhoo directed its shrillest cries against the so-called "cost of prohibition"—enforcement expense and loss of taxes. When the estimates of Dr. Fisher and other economists crediting prohibition with a saving to the American people of billions every year is compared with amounts expended for enforcement and amounts not realized in taxes the balance vastly favors prohibition.

The regiments of pens and tongues enlisted at the command of damp dollars for the return of rum bombarded American opinion into complete surrender with unfounded assertions that prohibition had let loose upon America a huge army of Federal spies and snoopers, menacing the homes and imperiling the peace and quiet of the people. The truth is that in each year of the dry epoch about 1,700 Federal prohibition agents were engaged in enforcement work among more than 100,000,000 people over an area of 3,000,000 square miles; that is, 1 to every 64,000 people and every 17,000 square miles.

This little group of dry agents was pictured as a swarm of murderers and corruptionists. To no avail did prohibitionists point out that the killing of 179 law violators and arrest resisters and 91 law officers in connection with more than half a million arrests over a period of 13 years; the officers contending in many instances with the most desperate cutthroats, comprised a remarkably moderate record. The wonder is that more clashes of fatal character did not occur, in view of the ridicule the press, the stage, the movie, and other organs of publicity constantly heaped upon the prohibition laws.

The charge of wholesale corruption is equally baseless. Before June 30, 1933, 21,000 different persons, roughly speaking, had been employed at different times in Federal prohibition work. According to the records, only 1,739 were separated from the service for illegal acts from 1920 to 1933. In other words, during the 13½ years of Nation-wide prohibition less than 8⅓ percent, or an average of about three fifths of 1 percent a year, of Federal prohibition officials were found guilty of corruption or other illegal conduct, although the strictest supervision over their operations was maintained.

Against that tremendous barrage of false and misleading propaganda the parent-teachers associations and the National Education Association, organizations comprising parents and teachers from every part of the country, stood solidly to the last. The mothers and the teachers knew what prohibition meant to the youth of America, but such was the obsession for the return of drink that their voices went unheeded and unheard. Some day those voices will call the Nation back to right and duty, but after what a penance of agony and tears!

For every dollar taken from the American masses in liquor taxes, at least four or five dollars in addition will go to the groups that make and sell liquor. It will require the development of an almost universal drink habit among the American people to furnish the amounts they will be called upon to pay for liquor in order to enrich the liquor barons and supply the revenues which would otherwise reach the Government from the coffers of corporate and individual wealth. Then will begin the descent back to a debauched and drink-sodden status for this Nation. To maintain and foster such an infamy it will be necessary for its beneficiaries to control and to corrupt elections and much of the machinery of government.

The processes of the past will be repeated. In my own State of Texas the attorney general in 1916 presented evidence against seven leading Texas brewing companies, embracing practically the entire liquor interest in Texas, revealing the domination and corruption of government the liquor interest was forcing upon the State. The attorney general proved among other things that those brewing companies were using their means and assets to violate Texas antitrust laws, that they were illegally spending large sums of money, individually or through the Texas Brewers Association, to control the legislature, to carry local-option elections, to pay poll taxes, and to handle votes.

The mass of evidence adduced by the attorney general on that occasion explains the extent to which laws were being violated and the extent to which public men, institutions, and citizens were subjected to the corrupting influences of the liquor trade. A letter was submitted as part of the evidence in that case from a prominent brewing official, written in 1911, and stating that over half a million dollars had been expended in Texas during the preceding 5 years to fight legislation adverse to liquor interests; that since 1900 approximately a million dollars, or $100,000 a year, had been spent in Texas to fight dry legislation and defeat the drys in local-option elections. This experience in Texas was typical in greater or less degree of that in almost every other State.

Turning to the Nation, it may be observed that the organized liquor forces were operating in a vicious circle throughout the country. State brewing associations in the several States and a central organization, the United States Brewers Association, were seeking at all times to prevent the passage of laws to restrain and govern liquor, to break down legislation enacted for its regulation and control, and to elect to public office men pledged to their cause, and to defeat those who dared to resist and denounce them.

For instance, in the 1917 case of the United States against the United States Brewers Association, it was revealed that in 1910 the United States Brewers Association had participated in 27 State campaigns, winning substantial victories in all of them but one; that during the two preceding sessions of Congress over 200 bills adverse to liquor had been introduced, and that only one had been allowed by the brewery representatives to pass; that in 1913 the United States Brewers Association gave $330,138 and the Wholesale Liquor Dealers Association gave $90,000 to a fund for use in influencing the election of Governors, Lieutenant Governors, United States Senators, United States Representatives, and members of State legislatures.

An investigation by the United States Senate Judiciary Committee in 1918 and 1919 disclosed that from 1913 to 1918 the total bank deposits of the United States Brewers Association amounted to more than $4,000,000. This investigation also demonstrated that brewing and liquor forces throughout the country had furnished large sums of money for the purpose of secretly controlling newspapers and periodicals; that they had succeeded in dominating primaries, elections, and political organizations; that they had contributed enormous sums of money for political campaigns in violation of Federal statutes and the statutes of the several States; that they had exacted pledges from candidates for public office prior to election; that for the purpose of influencing public opinion they had attempted to subsidize and had partly succeeded in subsidizing large sections of the press; that they had created their own political organizations in many States and in smaller political units in order to carry into effect their own political will, and financed such organizations with large contributions and assessments; that they organized clubs, leagues, and corporations of various kinds for the purpose of secretly carrying on political activities without having their interest known to the public; that they improperly treated the funds which they expended for political purposes as a proper expenditure of business, and consequently failed to return the same for taxation under the laws of the United States; that they undertook through a cunningly conceived plan of advertisement and subsidy to control and dominate the foreign-language press of the United States; that they subsidized authors of standing in literary circles to write articles for standard periodicals; that for many years a working agreement existed between the brewing and distilling interests of the country by which the brewing interests contributed two thirds and the distilling interests one third of political expenditures by the joint interests. This is only a summary of what the committee found. The total evidence is staggering almost to the limits of belief. No other organizations in American annals ever approached the sinister careers of these brewing and distilling groups. And to think that the United States must walk this path again!

In wet Great Britain, where the liquor forces hold sway today, the same corrupt and lawless efforts are being made by the liquor interests to subject organized government to their control and domination.

For example, the Royal Commission on Licensing, which studied the liquor problem in England and Wales, reported in 1932 that members and ex-members of Parliament testified to the pressure brought to bear in their constituencies by political liquor organizations. Evidently the liquor trade has developed a strong, alert organization in England skilled in the concentration and direction of its forces in the political field.

It is said that the return of liquor will mean the employment of hundreds of thousands of men. The answer is that for every dollar spent for beer or other liquor, a dollar less will be spent for food, shelter, clothing, education, medical service, radios, autos, travel, and other facilities and features of modern life; and that for every employee made possible by alcoholic beverages, several employees will be discharged from the industries producing necessities on account of the larger number of employees in the latter per unit of capital invested and on account of the diversion of enormous sums from the purchase of necessities to the purchase of liquor. A wet convention in my State last year drafted a resolution calling on the people of Texas to help the fight for higher wages, higher prices for farm products, more buying power for all our people. No one will quarrel with these objectives; but where is the relationship between these things exemplifying prosperity and the things more immediately suggested by a wet convention—to wit, the traffic in a narcotic drug, saloons, poverty, crime, diseased and broken bodies, mothers and children cowering before the curses and the lashes of drunken husbands and fathers? Is there any semblance of prosperity in the spectacle of wages and earnings of millions of American workingmen squandered for liquor? Can there be any prosperity for the masses of the people in shouldering a colossal portion of the tax burdens of corporations and distillers? If prosperity returns, it will return despite this condition and will be handicapped by it.

The wet propagandists capitalized the depression and the economic unrest in order to intensify the fight on the eighteenth amendment. We were told that the absence of liquor was the root of all our troubles and that all we needed was an ocean of beer and wine and whisky to float us back to plenitude and happiness. And yet in wet England, wet France, wet Germany, and other wet countries all overflowing with liquor, experiences with depression were fully as terrifying as ours, if not more so. If liquor has such national recuperative powers and is so productive of prosperity, we wonder why it has been so disappointing a remedy in these wet foreign countries.

As a matter of fact, liquor in its long reign upon earth has never helped the man consuming it to place a single dollar in the bank. It has never been worth a dime to him upon going to the grocery store for flour, coffee, meat, milk, or butter for his family and himself. It has never helped him to place a single cent's worth of coal or wood or gas in his house to keep the home fires burning. It has never helped him to get a job although it is on record as having lost him many jobs. It has never in its long life convinced a single railroad employer that a man smelling of liquor would make a better engineer or fireman than the fellow with a liquorless breath and an unclouded head. It has never been of any value to anyone in starting a life-insurance policy. Liquor is not on record as helping the man consuming it to buy a home, or to start one through a building-and-loan association. It has never once helped him to pay his doctor or to contribute to the life of his church. No instance has been found where it has helped him to educate and train his children for citizenship or for manhood and womanhood. Two small groups profit by liquor—the tax-evading millionaires and those who manufacture and distribute it. Yes; it means prosperity for them, but it also means a living hell for its countless victims.

The limit of audacity was reached when the wet propagandists advanced the claim that the eighteenth amendment violated personal and State rights. Let it be remembered that there are no vested or personal rights to manufacture, sell, transport, or consume intoxicating liquor, a drug that destroys for millions of people the capacity to exercise liberty and the rights and responsibilities of citizenship on the one hand and brings into existence a corrupt special interest, dominating government, controlling elections, thus polluting the very foundations of liberty on the other. The wet forces seem never to have grasped the elemental truths that liberty must be defined in terms of human welfare; that the rights of women and children to a decent and comfortable existence are superior to the right of an individual to drink intoxicating beverages; that frequently by suppressing the liberty to do a less important thing we release the liberty to do a more important thing; that the person who will not subordinate his physical appetite to the general well-being cannot logically be called a good American.

There are no higher and more sacred rights in our philosophy of government than individual personal rights and the rights of the several States. But we should never permit these rights to be used as excuses for evil or as cloaks for crime. Our history reveals that never when confronted with a national evil or a national enemy have we said that it was not within our view of government to take action commensurate with the good of the Nation as a whole, the good of all the States, the good of all persons, action designed to protect the country against a selfish, an arrogant, a destructive, or a profiteering special interest. There has never been a time in our history when national action was needed and when national action was taken that representatives of special interests have not sent up wails and lamentations about personal and State rights.

The eighteenth amendment ought to be reembodied in the American Constitution, a measure prohibiting an evil that will undermine the Nation's vitality and impede the Nation's advancement.

In every country the same terrible indictment stands against liquor. From every land ascend the cries of the multitudes it has damned. Among almost every people it is one of the chief sources of the murders, the suicides, the debaucheries of body and of mind. Every moment it crushes some home, some heart. It arrests the physical and mental growth of children, distorting the moral sense, promoting disobedience of parents and disregard for law. It curses the future generations of its victims, the crazed, the maimed, the palsied, and the blind, into whose blood the alcoholic taint is inevitably transmitted. It wrecks domestic happiness and betrays the most sacred vows. It contains no nourishment; it gives no strength. It impairs the vital functions of the human organism. It destroys moderation and self-control, releasing every low and savage impulse. Instead of satisfying thirst, it leaves increasing thirst, a thirst suggesting at last the agonies of hell. It lowers the efficiency of labor and weakens the foundations of industrial progress. It multiplies the hazards on our streets and highways, imperiling the lives of motorists, pedestrians, and little children. It increases the liability to disease, especially to infectious maladies like tuberculosis. It diverts the earnings of mankind into channels of economic waste, causing a loss that far exceeds the revenues it provides for governmental use. It ought to be returned to the jungles and the haunts of outlawry to which the eighteenth amendment consigned it 14 years ago.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, about an hour ago I submitted to the Senate the report from the Senatorial Campaign Expenditures Committee. I desire to call up that report and submit some remarks to the Senate with respect to it. I trust that all Senators will read the report in detail, because it will be found to set forth the situation as the committee found it, relating to the matters investigated by it, much more fully than any remarks which I shall be able to submit, speaking without manuscript.

Mr. President, there has been a great misconception throughout the country with reference to the functions and powers and jurisdiction of the committee. It was apparently popularly believed that the committee was in Louisiana for the purpose of investigating the election of Senator HUEY P. LONG and not that of Senator JOHN H. OVERTON. There was also a wide-spread conviction that we were down there generally investigating Senator LONG, but this conviction obtained without any real knowledge of what were the powers of the committee.

I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the resolution (S.Res. 174) appointing the committee was passed by the Senate before any election whatever took place in 1932. We were not directed to investigate any particular election anywhere. The functions of the committee as defined in the resolution were to investigate campaign expenditures anywhere in the United States with regard to senatorial elections, elections for Vice President and President, either in the primaries or in the general election. The committee had no jurisdiction to investigate any election in 1930, at which time Senator LONG was elected. It had no jurisdiction to investigate anything except those matters set forth in the resolution.

Those matters were as follows:

First. Investigate campaign expenditures of candidates for United States Senator in 1932.

Second. Investigate means or influence other than the use of money that influenced the election or nomination of a Senator.

Third. Investigate all other facts in relation to the nomination and election of Senators which would not only be of public interest but which would aid the Senate in enacting any remedial legislation or in deciding any contests which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the United States Senate.

The committee was not authorized to investigate an election contest. There was no contest.

Mr. President, in pursuance of the resolution, the committee called upon all candidates for the United States Senate and their managers in every State in the Union where senatorial elections were held to file with the committee a statement of expenditures. We also called upon the managers of the Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates. Those candidates or their managers responded, and the Senate has that material available for any use to which it may desire to put it.

The committee was authorized to investigate transactions with regard to expenditures in 1932 either upon its own motion or upon the complaint of any individual or candidate or anybody else. Under these powers the committee entertained a complaint in the form of a letter filed by then Senator Edward S. Broussard, of Louisiana, in which he made certain charges with respect to the primary election in Louisiana held on the 13th day of September 1932, in which he was a candidate and in which Senator OVERTON was a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the United States Senate. The complaint was rather a long document, and I shall not undertake within the compass of these remarks to outline all of the charges. They appear fully set forth in the report which is submitted to the Senate and which will be available to all interested parties.

Senator Howell, of Nebraska, who was originally the chairman of the committee, directed Senator Bratton, of New Mexico, and myself to proceed to New Orleans on the 5th of October 1932, a few days after the primary and about a month before the general election, to hear the complaint of Senator Broussard. That subcommittee repaired to New Orleans. The charges were filed, and replies were filed. At that time the parties announced that they were not ready to proceed and asked that the committee recess in order that they might prepare their case. The committee accordingly recessed.

The committee was then composed of Senator Howell, of Nebraska, chairman; Senator John G. Townsend, of Delaware; Senator Robert D. Carey, of Wyoming; Senator Sam G. Bratton, of New Mexico; and myself, the junior Senator from Texas. Subsequently in the winter of 1933, last winter, during the regular session of the Congress, Senator Howell and Senator Carey, as a subcommittee, proceeded to New Orleans, where they held hearings for some 2 weeks or more. At the last session of Congress a reorganization of the committee took place because of the change of political power from one side of the aisle to the other, and Senator Bratton became chairman of the committee. Senator Bratton retired from the Senate shortly thereafter, and the junior Senator from Texas was selected as chairman of the committee, after the adjournment of the last session of Congress.

In the meantime, because of the death of Senator Howell, Senator Thomas of Utah and Senator Logan of Kentucky were added to the committee to succeed Senator Bratton and Senator Howell. I did not become chairman of the committee until after the adjournment of the last session of Congress on the 17th day of June. At that time the committee had a meeting and determined upon its course with reference to future hearings. We had just been through a grinding, very hard session of the Congress. Most of the members of the committee wanted to return to their homes, and it was decided that the hearings would not be resumed until October 16. That was agreed upon unanimously by the members of the committee.

At that first meeting an investigator of the committee, a man by the name of Holland, who had been employed by Senator Howell, was present. Laboring under delusions of grandeur, or something akin to that, he proceeded to express himself rather impertinently to the committee as to what the committee ought or ought not to do. As chairman of the committee at that time, I indicated to Holland that his functions were those of an employee of the committee and that the committee would decide when it would start hearings and also its general policy. At that meeting a motion was made and adopted instructing Holland to spend the time prior to the meeting of the committee in October in the preparation for the use of the committee of a great mass of material which had already been accumulated by a number of investigators whom the committee had sent to Louisiana.

The committee had five investigators at one time or another at work in the State of Louisiana, who accumulated a mass of material which the committee could not perhaps have heard had it sat in continuous session for a year. The combined time of those investigators in Louisiana amounted to 54 weeks, or more than a year for a single investigator. What the committee desired was the organization and the briefing of that testimony, because our money was about gone and we wanted to conclude the hearings in the most expeditious manner possible.

When the committee met in June, it had only about $10,000 to pay for the stenographic reporting of the hearings, salaries of employees, and the other expenses of the committee, expenses of witnesses, and all other charges. For that reason the committee thought the time of the investigator would best be spent here in Washington, briefing and preparing the evidence for the use of the committee. But he wanted to go to Louisiana. There was some little heat in that first meeting. We retained him because he was already with the committee, having been selected by Senator Howell. He was not, except to that extent, the selection of the committee as it is now constituted.

When October 16 approached, the chairman of the committee, knowing that many of the members were at their homes, sent telegrams to all of the members of the committee and asked whether or not October 16 was still a desirable date.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just there?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that all of the $25,000 appropriated by the Senate for investigations throughout the United States was expended in the investigation of this one State?

Mr. CONNALLY. All of it was spent on Louisiana. We had $25,000 appropriated to investigate all elections in the United States. We have spent it all on Louisiana.

Mr. President, in the telegram which I sent to other members of the committee I advised them that during the week beginning October 16 I should like to be in Texas, and I should like to postpone the hearing for a short time if it was agreeable to the other members. I have those telegrams before me. In reply, I received a telegram from the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] that his engagements were such that he could not be present at any of the hearings. I received a telegram from the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] indicating that he was engaged on the Banking and Currency Committee, and it was doubtful if he could be present. I received a telegram from the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] that, although he was willing to come at any time, he preferred, if possible, that he be allowed to remain in Utah until after November 7.

I wanted to arrange the sessions of the committee to suit the members, and I knew that we could expend all of the funds that we had long before the session of Congress began; and I did not deem it important whether we met on the 16th of October or on some other date. As a result, it was finally agreed that November 13 would be an agreeable date.

When that date was agreed upon, I had already for some months an engagement for the 13th of November, so I telegraphed the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who was the next Senator in rank, advising him that it would be impossible for me to be present on the first day, but that I would be there on the second day and for him to proceed with the hearing. I ask unanimous consent that that telegram be placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

NOVEMBER 6, 1933.

Senator M. M. LOGAN,
Bowling Green, Ky.
Senator ROBERT D. CAREY,
Careyhurst, Wyo:

Committee hearing set for November 13 at New Orleans. It will be 14th before I can reach there, but subcommittee can proceed on 13th. Have had investigator proceed to New Orleans. Please advise if you expect to be present on 13th.

TOM CONNALLY.

Mr. CONNALLY. On the 6th day of November I sent the following telegram to the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS]:

NOVEMBER 6, 1933.

Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS,
Salt Lake City, Utah:

Telegram received; hearing has been set for 13th, but I shall not be able to reach New Orleans until 14th. Other members of committee can proceed until I arrive; regards.

TOM CONNALLY.

A similar message was sent to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

The investigator, Holland, was also advised by telegraph by me on the 13th day of November that I would be there on the following day.

Mr. President, I submit these telegrams and ask for their inclusion in the RECORD in order that the Senate may know the basis of some of the aspersions and reflections that have been cast upon this committee by certain partisan and bitter antagonists in the political field in Louisiana, and some of them outside of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

SEPTEMBER 25, 1933.

Senator M. M. LOGAN,
Bowling Green, Ky.
Senator ELBERT D. THOMAS,
Salt Lake City, Utah.
Senator ROBERT D. CAREY,
Careyhurst, Wyo.
Senator J. G. TOWNSEND,
Selbyville, Del.

The hearing on Overton election matter has been set for New Orleans for October 16. I would like to be in Texas during that week and would like to postpone the hearing until October 23 or October 30. Please advise if either of these dates will be satisfactory to you and your preference. Unless it is agreeable to members of the committee to make change I shall let the original date stand. Please advise me by wire.

TOM CONNALLY.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, September 26, 1933.

Senator TOM CONNALLY,

As soon as a decision is made, wire from you will be appreciated. Regards,

ELBERT D. THOMAS.

TOM CONNALLY.

Mr. CONNALLY. So the committee convened in New Orleans on the 13th day of November. As already indicated, I had advised members that it would be impossible for me to be there until the 14th. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] called the committee to order. At that time former Senator Broussard appeared and withdrew from the hearing the first day of the hearing on the ground that he had lost confidence in the committee. Senator Broussard had no basis whatever for any such insinuation or reflection. The hearing was originally instituted at the request of Senator Broussard, and every consideration accorded to him. He filed a complaint in the case. A full hearing was held in February of last year at which he was present. Senator Broussard filed voluminous charges; but, so far as I know, he never submitted to the committee any one witness, but invited the committee to go out and put investigators in every parish of the State and ascertain and prove, if possible, the charges which he had alleged, simply on information and belief.

I have always entertained a high personal regard for the former Senator from Louisiana, Mr. Broussard; but he had no warrant for making the reflections and insinuations that he did.

A few days before the hearing in New Orleans Senator Broussard called me over the long-distance telephone at my home and wanted to know if the committee was going to employ counsel to conduct the investigation in New Orleans. I told Senator Broussard that at a meeting of the committee on June 17, at which it was organized, the committee had decided that we would not employ counsel, because we had only $10,000 remaining to pay all of our expenses, and the committee had decided that since there were several lawyers on the committee they themselves would examine the witnesesses and conduct the investigation. He then suggested that he would very much like to have Holland conduct the investigation as counsel. The chairman told him that he would not reverse the committee's action until the committee met in New Orleans, but that if the committee desired that course to be followed the chairman would be perfectly willing to have it done.

So the secret and the basis of the venom which was exemplified in the outbursts of the investigator for the committee lay in the fact that he was embittered at the chairman and the committee because of the unpleasantness in the June 17 meeting here in Washington, and in the fact that the committee had told him to remain here and digest the evidence rather than to go out on another trip; and he was further embittered by the fact that he wanted to be counsel for the committee, and conduct the investigation, and be on the front page of the papers every day as another "great, outstanding investigator." When that was not done the investigator, in a sensational outburst, accused first the chairman of the committee. He said the chairman was afraid to come down to Louisiana on the first day, but that he would be there on the second day. Well, I am wondering what the difference is, what the terrors are in Louisiana on the first day that vanish on the second day. Everybody knew that I would be there on the second day, and I was there on the second day. We saw no "big, bad wolf" when we got there. The other committee members were there; and in order to gain his headlines and his publicity, and have a little brief hour in the press, the investigator imputed improper motives to all of the committee, and insinuated that the committee was trying to cover up something, or to shield somebody.

Mr. President, some inquire, "Why was not the investigator discharged and disciplined?" If it had been a matter of satisfying our own personal feeling, he would have been discharged perhaps. I do not know what the other members would have said about it. He was supposed, however, to have the evidence which the committee was to use and produce. We had only a small amount of funds still at our disposal, and we knew that if the investigator were discharged it would be said by those who wanted to criticize the committee that we were trying to shield somebody and were discharging the only man who had the information available. So we kept him on, suffering the humiliation of his presence there in the committee, taking the punishment as members of the committee in order that we might perform our duty to the Senate and obey its commands in investigating the lurid chapters of politics in Louisiana and putting them before the Senate for its consideration.

That is why we did not discipline the investigator—not because he did not deserve it, not because the committee did not feel the injustice and the outrage of his outburst, but because we had a solemn duty and function to perform; and we went through the humiliating publications in the papers and the headlines reflecting on the committee in order that we might come back here to the Senate and say, "We have performed the duty you imposed upon us, and we lay before you the facts with regard to this matter."

So much for that.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], formerly a member of the Supreme Court of Kentucky, a trained lawyer, was examining the witnesses; and this investigator, in another outburst, intimated and said that the Senator from Kentucky did not know anything about examining witnesses; that he did not know anything about the evidence. That is recited simply to show the venom and the spleen and the malice and the treachery in the outbursts and charges which the papers placarded all over the United States.

Mr. President, what did we do and what did we find when we met in Louisiana on the 13th day of November and proceeded to hear testimony?

I do not refer particularly to the other hearings. They are here in published form. A great mass of evidence was accumulated in February; and in the hearings in Louisiana recently concluded we covered 3 weeks of grinding, merciless, toilsome work. The committee did not restrict the investigation to the strict rules of evidence. The rules of evidence obtaining in the courts were not observed. We permitted the evidence to take a wide range. Technical objections were largely disregarded all the time, and we brought on the stand within the limited time that we had at our disposal everybody we could find who was supposed to know any facts. Before we ended our investigation we had expended all the funds which had been appropriated, and there is now a deficit for which we hope the Senate will make proper provision.

Mr. President, in October 1932, when the committee first met, Mr. Rightor was attorney for Senator Broussard, and filed the charges. He stated in the first hearing his conception of what the issue in this case was. That statement appears at page 15 of the report. It is not long, and I desire to read it at this time.

> Mr. RIGHTOR. Now, what is the jurisdiction of this committee? This committee is not trying an election contest between Mr. Overton and Senator Broussard. That is not the issue. This committee cannot determine that Senator Broussard is elected. This committee is appointed solely for the purpose of determining whether or not Mr. Overton's title to a seat in the United States Senate is clean. That is all this committee can decide, and it can decide nothing else.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The reason for that statement, as I understand it, lies in the fact that no contest was filed.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this first hearing in New Orleans in October 1932 took place a few days after the primary but before the general election. No contest was filed with the committee by Senator Broussard for the seat in the Senate or for the nomination, and Mr. Rightor did not intend to say "title to a seat" at that time, because the general election had not taken place. What he referred to, of course, was the question whether or not Senator OVERTON'S title to the primary nomination was clean. After the committee had had the first hearing, the general election in November occurred, and Senator OVERTON was elected in the general election without any opposition whatever.

Senator Broussard did not institute any contest of the nomination in the courts of Louisiana, nor did he institute any contest before this committee, and his attorney appearing before the committee specifically stated that Senator Broussard did not claim to have been nominated in the primary. That is set forth in the report. He did not claim to have been nominated and he did not file a contest, either respecting the primary or the general election. So, in the face of that record, there being no contest either in the courts or before the committee, Senator OVERTON having been elected after that time in the general election without any opposition, the only issue for the committee to determine and report back to the Senate was whether or not Senator OVERTON had been guilty of such fraud or corruption in the primary election as to disqualify him to be a Member of the United States Senate.

The committee undertook to secure all available evidence on that point. The charge of Senator Broussard did not claim that Senator OVERTON had been guilty personally of any fraud or corruption. He charged that the fraud and corruption had been committeed by the Long organization, or by the Walmsley organization, who were backing the candidacy of Senator OVERTON.

Mr. President, there are a number of aspects to this report to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. As will appear in the report, there are in Louisiana several very active and aggressive political factions. What is known as the Long organization, dominated and controlled by Senator HUEY P. LONG, has general control of the State outside of the city of New Orleans. Within the city of New Orleans, what are known as the "old regulars", or the machine of Mayor Walmsley, have normally control of the city. There is a rival organization in New Orleans called the Francis Williams organization.

When Senator OVERTON became a candidate for the Senate in the primary of 1932, the State Democratic organization, or the Long organization, announced its support of Senator OVERTON, and, if I mistake not, it is in evidence that Senator OVERTON knew before he announced that we would have the support of what is called the Long organization, or machine. Later on, the Walmsley organization endorsed him. The Williams organization of New Orleans espoused the cause of Senator Broussard.

There were a great number of charges with respect to practices and methods in the primary in Louisiana. Perhaps the most serious was that which related to what was called the dummy candidate device.

In Louisiana it is permitted, in the case of parish and local offices, for anyone who files as a candidate also to file names of candidates for election commissioners, the men who control the elections. After those names are filed and the candidate gets the benefit of them, he may then withdraw his candidacy for his office and receive back his filing fee. In other words, if an organization or a machine wants to get control of the primary election machinery, it has a number of local candidates file for parish offices. They then turn in the names of their candidates for election commissioners. All of those names are put in a hat, and then 5 are drawn out, and the first 5 who are drawn out are the election commissioners. Then the dummy candidates withdraw their candidacies for parish offices, having obtained control of the election machinery.

Mr. President, under the laws of Louisiana that is permitted. The Supreme Court holds that it is a political question, and the court will not go into it. In Louisiana there is no law against corrupt practices in the primaries. There is no law in Louisiana requiring campaign managers to file sworn statements of their expenditures. There is no law in Louisiana limiting the amount of campaign expenditures in primaries.

What occurred with reference to the dummy candidate device in the city of New Orleans? Our hearings were in the city of New Orleans. We did not have funds to send for witnesses all over the State. We did not have the money. We did hear a number of witnesses who did not reside in New Orleans, but most of our investigation was in the city, because the original complaint filed with us had placed most of the charges as to corruption and fraud in the city of New Orleans.

We find that in New Orleans, out of about 1,400 election commissioners, as I remember the number, the Long and Walmsley organization, by the use of dummy candidates, secured something like 1,200. I do not know the exact figures, but it was something like 6 or 7 to 1. Senator Broussard claimed that he had not participated in the filing of dummy candidates. Senator OVERTON made a similar contention. We absolved Senator Broussard from any active participation in securing dummy candidates for his ticket, but there were some dummy candidates, as I recall it now, for candidates alined with the Broussard ticket.

There is no doubt that in behalf of the ticket upon which Senator OVERTON was a candidate there were a large number of dummy candidates filed. Senatorial candidates, however, cannot file dummy candidates. These dummies are filed by local or parish officers. They are usually filed at the direction of the political leader or manager in the precinct or in the parish. There was no testimony and no charge, as I recall it, that Senator OVERTON had personally instigated the filing of any dummy candidates in his behalf.

Mr. President, the committee, after investigating thoroughly the dummy-candidate system in Louisiana, desires to express to the Senate and to the country its hearty condemnation of any such device. Such a device invites fraud; it is a fraud upon the rights of any free people, because when the election machinery or a large number of election officers are in the control of a political machine dominated and controlled perhaps, by 1 or 2 or 3 men, it is absolutely impossible for the public ever to know whether or not all of the ballots in the boxes were put there by the voters, or were put there by these hand-picked, selected political bushwhackers. Such a practice ought to be removed from the jurisprudence of Louisiana. It is a fraud upon the people of that State. Of course, the Senate has no jurisdiction to correct legislation of Louisiana, but the resolution under which the committee was appointed instructed the committee to report the facts to the Senate, and we are undertaking to perform that duty.

We find that in the city of New Orleans, in connection with many of the boxes where dummy candidates were used, there was fraud. However, with its limited funds and because the ballot boxes had long since been disposed of, the committee were unable to determine how extensive that fraud was or what would have been the result in the city of New Orleans and in the boxes in the other parts of the State where the dummy candidates had been used.

We did, however, determine that if all of the boxes where dummy candidates had been used or where they had been filed were wholly disregarded and thrown out, that Senator OVERTON would have an apparent majority on the face of the returns of 11,382 votes. It may be pointed out, furthermore, that on the face of the returns originally Senator OVERTON had a majority of 56,529 votes.

We find that by throwing out all of the boxes where the dummies were used or where they were intended to be used, apparently Senator OVERTON would still have had a majority of 11,382. We present this finding, not because we had any power to determine he was not nominated, but we do it in response to the instructions of the Senate to report back all facts within our knowledge respecting that particular thing; and it was necessary to do so in order to illustrate this damnable scheme of the dummy-candidate device.

Mr. President, we found in the State of Louisiana that it is a practice, under the present political system of that State, to assess State employees and State officials arbitrarily and compulsorily for campaign expenditures. Such a system, where the officeholder is compelled on penalty of losing his job to contribute, breeds fraud, opens up opportunity for tremendous campaigns funds, and particularly in Louisiana, where there is no law requiring a report of expenditures, or an accounting, and where the money is turned over to the political organization dominated by perhaps one man, there is no one who knows where that money goes, or whether it is in fact used for campaign expenditures, or whether it is employed for private or personal profit of members of the organization. That is a vicious system. It ought to be condemned, and this committee condemns it in the strongest possible terms.

Mr. President, our particular function was to investigate campaign expenditures. We undertook, to the best of our ability, to perform that duty. There appeared before us the campaign managers of Senator OVERTON. We have in the record a sworn statement as to their expenditures. We summoned before us the mayor of the city of New Orleans, Mr.

Walmsley, who is the head of the old regular organization supporting Senator OVERTON. We summoned the members of the State administration, various heads of departments, who admitted that they collected from their employees—always voluntarily, of course, according to their statement—assessments for campaign purposes.

It was in evidence that in September 1932 the State officeholders and employees were called upon for an assessment of 10 percent of their salaries. Senator OVERTON's friends contended that the assessment was made to pay a deficit in the campaign expenses of Governor Allen, which had occurred in January preceding.

Frankness, Mr. President, compels me to say that the fact that the Overton-Broussard primary was held in September 1932, and that the assessment on State officeholders was made in September 1932, about the time of the primary—maybe a few days later—raises in my mind a very strong presumption that that money was collected for the Overton campaign, and for the campaign of the associates of Senator OVERTON on his ticket.

Senator OVERTON denies that. His campaign managers deny that. All of the witnesses appearing before the committee, when interrogated as to what was the purpose of their contribution, said always, "To the Allen campaign deficit." "To the Allen campaign deficit", except one, as I recall it, and he presented a check, and on the corner of the check was marked "The Overton campaign fund." It was contended, of course, that that had been written on there after the check had been cashed. Of course, we do not know; we are not able to say as to that, but I will say this for myself: I believe that some of that money collected in September 1932 was employed for the Overton campaign, and I shall tell the Senate why and how.

Mr. Seymour Weiss, the manager of the Roosevelt Hotel in New Orleans, where the Long organization has its headquarters, was admittedly the handler of cash of all campaign collections and expenditures for both the Allen campaign for governor—Allen was supported by the Long organization—and Senator OVERTON and the congressional ticket in September. Mr. Weiss testified—and the sworn report of Senator OVERTON shows—that his campaign fund was made up of a lot of contributions of rather large amounts—$1,000, $1,500, $2,500, as I recall it—from a few individuals. Some of those individuals were State officers. One of them was the Governor, one of them was the conservation commissioner, one of them was on the dock board, I believe—about the latter I will not say that I am accurate in my statement—but at any rate a group of State officials. My belief is that the contributions which were made in their names, supposedly, were really collected by them first from employees under their jurisdiction, and, of course, when they turned them in and swore that they had made those contributions, it is like the boy who said, "That's my tale, and I am going to stick to it." They had to stick to the tale with which they started out.

Personally, my belief is that the bulk of the money for the Overton campaign and the congressional campaign came indirectly from assessments on State officials and employees.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Was there any evidence given as to any assessments made on Federal employees?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I do not think so. I do not think any of the Federal employees are controlled by the organizations there, and from present prospects it does not seem that any of them are going to be so controlled. There is a Federal statute, I shall say to the Senator, providing against soliciting campaign contributions from Federal employees on Federal property, as I remember it now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is not confined solely to Federal property. Section 118 of the Criminal Code, as amended, prohibits even the reception of a contribution by a Federal candidate from a Federal employee.

Mr. CONNALLY. I knew there was a statute on the subject, but I did not know how broad it was.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall yield in just a moment, Mr. President.

Let me further state to the Senator from Michigan that there ought to be in every State of the Union a similar statute with regard to compulsory assessments on State officials and employees.

I now yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. McADOO. Did I understand the Senator from Texas correctly when I thought I heard him say that there is no law in Louisiana which forbids the collection of assessments from State employees?

Mr. CONNALLY. There is no such law as far as we ascertained. We did not go down and examine all the digests, but the testimony before the committee was that there was no law in Louisiana requiring a report of campaign contributions in primaries, no law limiting the amount, no corrupt practices act. It seems to be the conception in Louisiana that nominations are matters purely within the control and regulation of party authority.

Let me say that under those conditions the assessment of candidates is particularly vicious, because they can be assessed at the will of any political boss or dictator, and there is no accounting as to where that money goes. It is a system under which helpless employees may be made the victims of extortion, and the money cannot be traced, as to whether it goes to the private pocket or the private profit of the power that dominates the machine, or whether it is spent for campaign or political purposes.

It is a system that breeds corruption, it is wrong, it is indefensible, and this committee hopes that the State of Louisiana will correct that system.

Mr. President, were I to go into great detail with regard to many of these matters, I would consume much time of the Senate. The report is supplemented by some 3,000 or more pages of printed testimony. We bring back this testimony and this report of the committee for the use of the Senate in any contest which may be filed or in any proceeding now pending before any other committee or the Senate.

I wish to make this observation at this point, in connection with my statement of the misunderstanding of the functions of this committee: That it has never had any jurisdiction of the charges looking to the ouster of Senator LONG. That matter has been before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and this committee in question has never had jurisdiction of it and never had any power with relation to it.

However, the press in Louisiana was unfair to the committee; it never made clear the issues, or the functions of the committee; and, in its desire to publish sensational material and sensational stuff, it left the impression that we were down there investigating the official conduct and the official actions of Senator LONG, and Senator OVERTON, until the later stages of the committee hearings, was somewhat obliterated and overlooked in the discussion by the press.

Mr. President, the report also devotes considerable attention to general political conditions in the State of Louisiana. We have already pointed out the political organizations there. I want to say a word about those political organizations. The situation is a strange one. One year two organizations will be aligned together, allied, in supporting a certain candidate for office; next year they may be fighting each other; and the following year they may be back together. It is the queerest political situation in Louisiana that it has ever been—I started to say the "privilege"—no; I do not say "privilege"—that it has ever been the part of the Senator from Texas to observe. I do not know much about the operation of machines in the great cities of the United States, but I shall say that I believe that any expert in these other cities could take a postgraduate course if he should visit New Orleans. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the Senate instructed us to report on general political conditions in Louisiana. The committee in its report says:

The situation in Louisiana as it relates to elections cannot be defended. The political organizations there play the political game according to the standard that the result is the important thing and the means of obtaining it are secondary considerations.

They play the game according to that standard. We find that in 1932—the year which this investigation covered—the so-called "Democratic Association of Louisiana", but more generally known as the "Long organization", absolutely dominated the politics of the State. It dictated who should run and who should not run; it dictated the candidates. In the city of New Orleans the Walmsley organization has had control for some time. In the Overton campaign these two organizations were both supporting Senator OVERTON.

We find, furthermore, that Senator HUEY P. LONG and his lieutenants completely dominate the State organization, which is known as the "Democratic Association." He not only controls the political organization but either he or the organization which he dominates controls the Governor; it controls his policies; it dominates all the State departments; it dictates who shall and who shall not run for office.

There is a very bitter factional division in Louisiana. The different groups are always at each other's throat. That resulted in this committee's being harassed and annoyed during its proceedings by howling groups. When one witness would testify favorably to one faction, half of the audience would give a great yell.

The committee tried to control that situation, but it had a very small amount of funds; the resolution required that the hearings be public, and we could not therefore hold executive sessions; we could not throw the crowd out. Then when the other side would have an inning, its partisans would yell and whoop; they would make spectacular entrances to the committee hearing. They had the hearing room packed, each crowd vying with the other as to which could get more people into the room. These were the conditions under which this committee labored. If the committee had consulted its own comfort, it would not have been there; but the committee felt that its duty to the Senate required that it stay in Louisiana in spite of these vexations, in spite of these harassments, in spite of the terrible conditions which we found there—to stay there and wade through it all in order to come back here and lay before the Senate a report as to the facts. We have done that; we have undertaken to discharge our duty to the Senate; we have not shielded anybody. Every piece of evidence that was worth while presenting was presented, and not a witness was suggested or presented by the investigator but who was put on the stand and given an opportunity to testify.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] examined the witnesses on the direct examination and also cross-examined them during the first week of the hearing. He did so in an able and distinguished manner. After the first week he was called away on official business, and for the 2 remaining weeks the Senator from Texas undertook to examine the witnesses and to cross-examine them. The Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] was present, and he has knowledge as to whether or not the Senator from Texas was zealous and earnest in undertaking to develop the facts in this controversy.

Mr. President, the election box is a place that ought always to be free from fraud or corruption. That is an ideal which probably will never be attained, but, at least, the law ought to throw around the ballot box some safeguard. The law of Louisiana ought to provide for regulations governing the expenditure of campaign funds; it ought to do away with the vicious system of dummy candidates; it ought to provide further safeguards, in order that those who are elected to State offices or who come here to the Senate may come with clean hands. This is illustrated by the testimony of one Seymour Weiss.

Mr. Weiss is manager of the Roosevelt Hotel. The Long organizations have their headquarters in that hotel. Mr. Weiss is the general fiscal agent for the Democratic organization of that State, known as "the Democratic Association" or known as "the Long organization." The committee had him on the stand last February, and recently in New Orleans we had him on the stand twice. We examined him as thoroughly and as vigorously as we knew how, and here is what he testified. He testified that he was the handler of the campaign collections and disbursements. He said that when the boys came in and told him they had to have $1,500 or $2,000 in order to pay campaign expenses, he simply went out among a few of his friends and said, "Give me $2,000 or $2,500", or whatever was needed. He then took that money and immediately paid all the bills, without making any record of the expenditures, without making any record of the receipts, and without keeping any books whatever. He said he made a few little memoranda on slips of paper, which were immediately destroyed.

Mr. President, under such a system, who knows how much money was collected? Who knows how much of it came from the employees of the State government? Who knows what was done with the money after they got it? The direct testimony in this case was that Senator Broussard spent $12,270.69 and that Senator OVERTON spent $13,116.42. Neither sum was unusually large as senatorial campaign expenditures go. The testimony, furthermore, from Mr. Weiss was that in all he handled something over $30,000 in the Overton campaign. He said all that money did not go to OVERTON's campaign. There were running four candidates for Congress who had the support of the Long organization. There was also a public-service commissioner running with the Long organization support. So Mr. Weiss simply arbitrarily prorated the more than $30,000 between these various candidates by giving some money to each one of them; and he testified that he allocated—I think that is a good word—$13,000 to the campaign fund of Senator OVERTON and then prorated the remainder to the various candidates for Congress.

We had every bank in New Orleans, as I recall—I think every one—summoned with regard to campaign expenditures. There were no campaign-expenditure accounts in any of the banks; they were too wise for that. Mr. Weiss kept the money in his office, and he says that he only goes out and collects money when he needs it, and then he immediately spends it, but he does not have any bank account. There were no written witnesses against him, and so the committee can only infer as to some of the evidence, because there is no direct evidence on it; but, as I said a while ago, my own particular belief is that the campaign funds that were contributed to Mr. Weiss by the various State officials and reported in Senator OVERTON's campaign as their personal contribution were in fact made up of assessments on State employees and officeholders who had turned over their money to the various heads of departments.

Mr. President, it was also contended by Senator OVERTON'S group that much of the funds collected in September 1932 from State officeholders and employees was utilized for the purpose of helping pay the Democratic deficit in the Presidential campaign. If that were true, that would be about the only bright spot to be found in the Louisiana situation. How much of that was spent nobody knows. I believe it was claimed that about $30,000 of the money which was collected by assessment of candidates was used for the purpose of helping pay the deficit.

Mr. CAREY rose.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CAREY. I do not now want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be glad to answer the Senator's question, if I can.

Mr. CAREY. I thought the Senator had made a mistake, but I find that he did not.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator for confirming in fact my accuracy.

Mr. President, I believe that, in general, pretty much covers the situation as the committee found it. It is more accurately and exactly covered in the reports.

So far as Senator OVERTON himself is concerned, the committee did not find on the evidence that he had personally been guilty of any corruption. There was no charge that he had. The only angle of the matter upon which the committee could possibly have acted was to infer that since his organization or the one with which he was alined used the dummy-candidate device, he would have been chargeable with knowledge of whatever frauds might have occurred.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. REED. Is not that the same situation that was shown in the Michigan case of Senator Newberry and in the more recent Pennsylvania case of Senator Vare—no personal corruption being shown against Newberry because he was not even in the State at the time of the campaign?

Mr. CONNALLY. I have not time to review those cases; but I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that, of course, the fact Newberry was not in Michigan had nothing to do with it, because he could have been guilty of personal corruption even if he had not been there.

Mr. REED. That is quite true, but Mr. Newberry was then an officer of the Navy and nobody pretended that he knew anything about the corrupt practices.

Mr. CONNALLY. That may be. I have not the time to discuss the Newberry case. I have a pretty able-bodied case right here before me now in Louisiana.

The committee had no power to pass on anything other than that which occurred at the primary or general election, because it was after the committee began the investigation that Senator OVERTON was elected in the general election without opposition. Mr. Broussard filed no contest in the State court and none before this committee. He appeared before the committee and specifically declared that he was not nominated and did not claim to have been nominated. While the committee did not have the right to investigate the primary or the general election with a view to determining title to the nomination or a seat in the Senate, we felt, since we had been directed to report all the facts, that we would report them back to the Senate. They are here; and if anybody wants to file a resolution to oust any Senator, those facts and the evidence are available to the Senate for that action.

There was no charge, as I said, concerning Senator OVERTON's personal participation in fraud. I might suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania, however, that if the expenditures had been as large and staggering in his case as they were in Pennsylvania and Michigan there might have been another element; but the testimony, so far as we could get it, was that the expenses were only $13,116.42 in one case and $12,270.69 in the other, according to direct evidence. There may have been larger expenditures, but the committee was not able to get testimony on that point to prove directly that they were larger. As for myself, I have already said that I believe a large part of the assessment of officehoulders in September, 1932, was utilized for the Overton campaign through the indirect agency of being passed through the hands of the various departments who collected that money.

Mr. President, we have undertaken to do our duty with respect to the case. It has not been a pleasant duty. It has not been an easy task. It has involved sacrifice of our comfort and it has involved our absence from home at a time when all of us were submerged in official duties; but we have undertaken, irrespective of all the harassment and the unjust criticism which were heaped upon the committee, to do our duty to the country and to the Senate. We come here now and submit this report and more than 3,000 pages of printed testimony for the use of the Senate in any proceeding that may be instituted or that may now be pending before the Senate.

Let me suggest that the resolution appointing us instructed us to find out the facts with regard to campaign expenditures—that is all it said in a general way—and to report back to the Senate "to aid the Senate in enacting any remedial legislation or in deciding any contest which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the United States Senate." That, we feel, has been done by the committee.

Mr. President, I am glad to advise the Senate that the report is unanimous. The 5 members of the committee have signed the report, the 3 Democratic members constituting the majority and the 2 minority members, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. It was not easy, in view of the disturbed conditions in Louisiana, always to get the truth. It was difficult. One crowd of witnesses would appear and testify to fraud in a certain ballot box and the other crowd would immediately appear and declare there was no fraud and deny all that the other witnesses had said.

We looked over all the witnesses. The committee had a difficult task to say whether they were telling the truth or whether they were not. For instance, one day a witness was produced who swore that Bill Jones—that was not his name, but that will answer the purpose—had voted in a certain ballot box, but that he was dead; that the witness knew he was dead because he saw a report in the newspaper that the man was dead. A few days later the other crowd went out and dug up "Brother Bill Jones" and produced him before the committee and made proffer of him alive. He had not died, so they said. [Laughter.] We do not know whether he was the same Bill Jones or somebody else.

That simply illustrates the difficulty we experienced in getting the facts and the exact facts in the State disturbed and distressed with violent passions and bitter partisan hatred, with several groups at each other's throats, fighting each other in one election and in the next election getting together and making common cause in order to get an office. Those were the conditions that confronted us. Some witnesses contended privately that they were afraid to testify because of the fear of reprisal against some of their kin folks who were holding jobs in the city or the State. They contended to us privately that they were afraid if they testified their kin folks would lose their jobs. They said they were afraid to testify for that reason among others.

Before I conclude I want also to say that we permitted a number of organizations and individuals to file in the RECORD charges and letters and statements regarding conditions there in order to get all of this material back to the Senate and to give everybody a day in court. A great many witnesses would make charges, but when they appeared before the committee it developed that they knew nothing of their own knowledge. They would say, "If you will go or send investigators into every ballot box in the State and stay with it, you will find it out. I know it is true, but I have no knowledge on the subject myself." That is the condition with which the committee was confronted.

We had an appropriation of $25,000 for the whole United States. We spent it all investigating this salacious story of political conditions in Louisiana. We have done the best we could. We submit the report to you, Mr. President, for the use of the Senate in the consideration of any remedial legislation and for use in any contest or other proceeding of ouster or for such other use as to the Senate may seem fit and proper.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the Senator yields the floor I want to ask him a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Has all the evidence taken by the committee been printed?

Mr. CONNALLY. It has not yet all been printed. We have not had time to print it, but it is available and ready for the Printer.

Mr. GEORGE. It is in process of being printed?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; it is in process of being finally indexed and prepared, and will be sent to the Printer within a few days and will then be available to the Committee on Privileges and Elections or any other committee or Member of the Senate that desires to see it.

Mr. GEORGE. The entire record?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; the entire record.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, permit me to begin my remarks by making the observation that I am glad that the labors of this committee are apparently at an end, and that this investigation of my nomination is apparently at an end.

At the time the charges were filed reflecting upon my nomination I desired an investigation. I interposed no obstacle to any investigation. I raised no technical objection. The only favor that I asked at the hands of the committee was a prompt, a speedy, a full, and a fair investigation of those charges.

For a long time, Mr. President, it seemed that that request was not to be granted. Apparently, the activities of the committee—and I say this with all due respect to the committee, collectively and individually—were concentrated in an effort to investigate the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] from his boyhood up to the time the hearings were held. The senior Senator from Louisiana was tried, and I was not being tried.

Then a change came over the situation. It seems, as has been indicated in the remarks made by the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that the committee itself was put on trial in the State of Louisiana by the instigators of these charges against my nomination; and still I was not being tried and I was not being investigated.

Then, Mr. President, the chief investigator employed by the committee, and representing the Government, was put on trial, and I was not.

Finally, the committee has completed its labors, and I take it, has put into the record all material testimony available to the committee in connection with the charges that were made against the legality of my nomination and my worthiness to occupy a seat in this body; and therefore I begin by congratulating myself.

I do not take issue with the report of the committee. The report of the committee, insofar as I am personally and individually concerned, is, as I interpret it, not a reflection upon my character or upon my conduct, and is not a finding against the validity of my nomination and the legality of my election.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator will bear in mind that the committee had no jurisdiction to decide whether the junior Senator from Louisiana was elected in the general election or not. It really had no jurisdiction to decide whether he was nominated or not. No contest was ever filed. The committee was not appointed to determine any contest. Our jurisdiction was to investigate campaign expenditures and general conditions.

So I think the Senator is in error when he concludes that the Senate committee's report passed on his title to a seat in the Senate, because that happened after the committee had taken jurisdiction. The committee took jurisdiction after the primary, but before the general election.

No charge has ever been filed here against the Senator, so far as I know, as to the title to his seat in the general election. He was permitted to take his seat on the 4th of last March; and under the law, if there had been any contest of the Senator's nomination, it would have had to be in the State courts of Louisiana, because the State laws control nominations; and no Senate committee could determine who was nominated or who was not nominated, especially since the general election coming along foreclosed that issue.

So I hope the Senator will not conclude that we are giving him a clean bill of health as to his election or his primary, because we did not pass on those questions.

Mr. OVERTON. Then why the investigation?

Mr. CONNALLY. The investigation was to determine campaign expenditures. If the Senator will read the resolution, he will see that it required the committee to report on campaign expenditures, whether they were excessive or not, I suppose whether they were corrupt or not, so that the Senate could exercise any power that it had with regard to legislating for the control of primary expenditures; and then the resolution directed us to obtain such other general information as would aid the Senate in determining any future contest that might be filed. That very language showed that the committee was not supposed to pass on a contest, because the resolution said, "any contest that might thereafter be filed." None being filed, the committee had nothing to do with it.

Mr. OVERTON. Then why the purpose of investigating only campaign expenditures and campaign contributions and charges of fraud and corruption attending my nomination, unless it was the purpose of the committee to submit a report to determine whether or not, as the Senator from Texas has said, my title to a seat in the United States Senate is tainted with fraud?

I will say in reply to the junior Senator from Texas that the committee acted under a resolution of the United States Senate which directed it to make an investigation of presidential, vice presidential, or senatorial campaigns of the year 1932 for two purposes. One was in order to aid the United States Senate in enacting any remedial legislation in reference to elections. The second was in order to aid the United States Senate in deciding any contest which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the United States Senate. Certainly the committee did not make an investigation of my primary election with a view of recommending to the Congress of the United States any remedial legislation regulating primary elections, because the Congress of the United States is without any authority whatsoever to enact any legislation undertaking to regulate primary elections; and, as the Senator from Texas well knows, the Supreme Court of the United States so decided in the Newberry case.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. Let me finish the thought, and then I will yield.

Certainly, then, the committee did not undertake its investigation in order to carry out the second purpose of the resolution, which was in order that it might aid the Senate in deciding any contest which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the United States Senate, because, as the junior Senator from Texas well points out, there never has been any contest of my seat in the United States Senate. There has been no adverse claimant of my seat in the United States Senate. There was no contest of my nomination before the State tribunals of Louisiana, where there was a remedy afforded.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator said a while ago that there could not have been any purpose in passing the resolution to call for information regarding legislation as to the primaries, and he cited the Newberry case, decided by the Supreme Court. Is it not true that the Newberry case, which held that the Congress could not regulate primaries, was decided by a divided court—by 4 to 5, as I recall now?

Mr. OVERTON. That is very true. Even in a divided court, however, the majority opinion makes the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, to be sure. So far as that case is concerned, it settles that case; but there are many who contend now, here in the Senate and outside of it, that since the constitutional amendment authorizing the popular election of Senators, Congress might and could legislate regarding senatorial primaries; and that may have been in the mind of the Senate, it may have been in the mind of the author of the resolution, when it was adopted.

Regardless of that, however, the committee was bound by the language of the resolution. We are not the Supreme Court. We cannot say that a resolution, in appointing us and telling us to do this and that and the other, is unconstitutional. The committee has to obey the mandate of the Senate, and that was to get all possible information regarding campaign expenditures.

The Senator made some animadversion with regard to fraud. If the Senator will examine the record, he will find that the report says that the committee found that there was fraud; that there was fraud in the boxes where the dummy candidates were used. The committee was unable to find out all of the fraud, or the extent of the fraud, or what would have been the result if there had been no fraud; but the committee did find that there was fraud in the election in Louisiana. The committee did not find that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] had personally participated in the fraud, because there was no charge that he had, and there was no probative evidence that he had, unless it simply be inferred from the fact that he accepted the support of the Long organization—which used the dummy candidates, and which shook down the State employees for contributions—that thereby he was chargeable with knowledge.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Texas has given me very much to reply to in the remarks he has made since I yielded to him.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not want to irritate the Senator.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator is not irritating me at all. I am very glad, indeed, to undertake to cover this case to the satisfaction, if I can, of the junior Senator from Texas and to the satisfaction of the other Senators.

Rather than enter into a discussion with the Senator from Texas as to what the committee found, perhaps it may be well for me to read certain extracts from the printed report filed by the committee.

On the subject of dummy candidates, concerning which the junior Senator from Texas talked at some length, the committee declares:

> It is contended that dummy candidates filed who were favorable to both Senator OVERTON and to Senator Broussard, but Senator Broussard claims that no dummy candidates, with possibly one small exception, were filed in his interest. The evidence is conflicting on the point, but the committee exonerates Senator Broussard of any knowledge of any dummy candidate filed in his interest, and there is no evidence that he had any part in it, if any such candidates were filed. The same can be said of Senator OVERTON so far as his inducing anyone to file as a dummy candidate is concerned. Dummies were filed by organizations supporting his candidacy but no evidence that he personally directed or procured the filing of dummies was submitted.

I take it, therefore, Mr. President, that the committee exonerates me from any personal responsibility in reference to the filing of dummy candidates. I interpret the report of the committee as completely exonerating me from any implication of fraud. I quote from the report of the committee:

> There was no charge made by the complaint filed with the committee that Senator OVERTON personally participated in any fraud or with guilty knowledge approved any fraud. There was no probative evidence produced before the committee that Senator OVERTON personally participated in or instigated any fraud, unless the inference were indulged that being the beneficiary of whatever frauds would result from the employment of the dummy candidate device by the organizations supporting his candidacy he was chargeable with knowledge thereof. We cannot indulge such an inference in the face of the fact that there was neither a charge nor evidence to that effect.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I may say to the Senator on that point that quite a number of witnesses testified, if he will recall, that they made no charge against him personally, that the only charge they made was that he was running with the LONG crowd. That was the chief charge of some of the witnesses, that he was the Long candidate. I state that for the Senator's benefit, that there was some evidence by a number of witnesses who said, "We know Senator OVERTON, and we have no charge to make against him, but he is just running with HUEY LONG and the wrong gang."

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. That has been the head and front of my offending, that when I offered as a candidate for the United States Senate I accepted the support of HUEY LONG and of the Long organization. But that support came to me without any solicitation and without any agreement. I not only had the support of the Long organization, but I also had the support of the regular Democratic organization of the city of New Orleans, and that support came to me unsolicited and without any trade or dicker.

I not only had the support of these two political organizations, but I had the support of organized labor, from the American Federation of Labor on down to the local organizations in the State of Louisiana, and that support came to me without any solicitation.

Had I not had the support of Senator LONG, I state here that there never would have been any charges filed against me, and the very purpose of the instigators of these charges has not been to unseat me in the United States Senate, has not been to try to convince the United States Senate that my title to a seat is tainted with fraud, but the whole purpose, from the beginning to the end of the inquiry, has been to use the senatorial investigating committee and the United States Senate itself as a channel and a conduit by which to dump upon the senior Senator from Louisiana all the filth and the garbage and the sewage that his political opponents could accumulate in the State of Louisiana. The record shows that.

During the spring hearings of 1932, as has been well stated by a member of the committee, 90 percent of the evidence was devoted to the political career and the private life and the public life of HUEY P. LONG. They had no proof at any time by which their charges against my nomination and against my election could be substantiated. I am not now referring to the committee, I am referring to the proponents of these charges. Their very purpose was to get a printed record, under the auspices of the United States Senate, printed volumes which they could use in the State of Louisiana as their political bible in their future campaigns against the senior Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, will he tell me whether there is a campaign being conducted in Louisiana at the present time?

Mr. OVERTON. There is a campaign on now, a Municipal campaign, in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. WHEELER. When does the election take place?

Mr. OVERTON. On January 23.

Mr. WHEELER. I presume a part of this material is being used at the present time in Louisiana, in that city campaign, for the purpose of creating sentiment either for or against one of the groups in that election?

Mr. OVERTON. It is being used. I am going to refer to some of the political uses being made of this investigation in the State of Louisiana.

In order to show the ruthless injustice of those who made these charges, and in order to show how unconscionable they are in their statements, I shall present as exhibit no. 1, in answer to the question propounded by the Senator, a dispatch from the city of Washington appearing in the Times-Picayune in the city of New Orleans, a paper opposed to me politically, and politically devoted to the purpose of undertaking to wreck the political fortunes of Senator LONG. This dispatch is dated Washington, December 21, and is as follows:

> A statement by Senator TOM CONNALLY, of Texas, dealing with the Louisiana election case, and an informal meeting of the select committee of the Senate, prompted widespread comment on this subject in Washington today. The thought was expressed that the committee seems to be growing braver since things are breaking against Senator HUEY P. LONG.

Senators know the Senators who compose this committee, and they know whether or not they are arrant cowards, whether they have shirked their duty, or whether they have conscientiously performed it. Such has been the view and conception of the United States Senate and of its committee by the opposition that the evident attempt has been made to try to frighten and browbeat and intimidate this committee into making an adverse report not only against me, but also and principally against Senator LONG.

Is this investigation being used in the campaign now being conducted in the city of New Orleans for the election of a mayor and a city ticket? I say to the Senator from Montana that it is. The junior Senator from Texas has told the Senate that the leader of the organization that was opposed to my candidacy was one Francis Williams, leader of an organization known as the Jackson Democratic Organization, and presently a candidate for the mayoralty of New Orleans.

On January 8, 1934, Francis Williams thus addressed the assembled multitudes of the city of New Orleans in the present political campaign. I quote from the Times-Picayune of January 8:

It is sufficient, I think, for me to say that both General Ansell and John G. Holland have stated to many people that if it were not for Francis Williams there never would have been any Senate investigation.

All of the people know that I saved the November Overton hearings—

That was November of last year, a few months ago.

All of the people know that I saved the November Overton hearings when Ed Rightor had fled the scene and the duty-dodging Senators were preparing to flee, too, and tell Washington that all of our anti-Long fight was bunkum; Walmsley was testifying for LONG then.

My fight to hold these scared Senators' feet to the fire is history that all know.

Senators, that is a concrete evidence and an illustration of the mendacious and unconscionable attitude of the proponents of this investigation. After publishing in the newspapers of Louisiana appeals to the people to come forward with evidence to support their baseless allegations of fraud, it was they who stood side by side with the junior Senator from Texas when he was conducting the examination of the witnesses and gave him the names of the witnesses, and a statement of what they expected to establish by them, and those witnesses consisted largely of minions and of henchmen drawn from the Francis Williams organization.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator from Louisiana realize that if the committee were to have any witnesses to develop the case it had to take the opponents of the Senator? The Senator would not expect us to take the witnesses from his own organization. The committee had to take men who were more or less hostile to the Senator, in order to get that side of the controversy. I do not think the Senator will charge that the Senator from Texas was unfair in the examination of the Senator's own witnesses who were produced before the committee; but the Senator from Texas, and other members of the committee, did avail themselves of every bit of evidence, whether it came from the side of the fence of the Senator from Louisiana or the other side, or whether it came from the streets or the alleys of New Orleans, or anywhere else. We took all available evidence and put it in the record, and brought it here to the Senate. We could not reject a witness because he happened to be aligned against Francis Williams or was against the Senator from Louisiana, or what his motives or his purposes were. We had to take what was available. I will say that there was not very much that was to the contrary.

Mr. OVERTON. I was simply pointing out to the Senate the character of those who preferred these charges, and of those who furnished the evidence, and the source from which it was derived.

I do not think it is necessary for me to detain the Senate in undertaking to analyze the testimony in reference to whether or not there was any fraud or corruption at the polls on election day in the State of Louisiana. I think I may content myself by referring to the findings of the committee, on page 18 of their report, when after devoting one sentence to certain supposed facts to which witnesses had testified, the committee goes on to state as follows:

On the other hand, witnesses were produced by Senator Overton to contradict the testimony of those witnesses who had given evidence of such fraudulent practices. One or more witnesses would testify to fraudulent practices within a particular precinct, and other witnesses would be produced to testify that no such fraudulent practices were engaged in.

I will digress for a moment to take up only one phase of this testimony, and that is an incident to which the junior Senator from Texas referred. He said that they had undertaken to establish that a dead man had been voted on election day, and, presumably, for Overton. I do not know whether or not the junior Senator from Texas knows what was back of that display of evidence on the part of the instigators of these charges, but I shall say to him, and to the Members of the Senate, that at the time these charges were filed it was stated, among other untruthful statements that were made, and which have never been supported by any evidence worthy of being dignified as proof, that on election day in the city of New Orleans "the graves stood tenantless, and the sheeted dead went gibbering" down the streets of New Orleans to cast their ballots for OVERTON. And so when the hearing came on in the city of New Orleans they placed upon the witness stand a star witness to establish that a dead man had voted on election day—only one. Peter Barros was his name. They identified him by his registration number, by his place of residence, giving his street number, and with a great deal of show and demonstration in the examination, that lasted in chief for about an hour, it was apparently shown conclusively by the testimony of this witness that Peter Barros was dead on election day; not only dead, but he had been buried; not only buried, but this witness testified that he had read his funeral notice in the newspapers, and he almost sobbed as he narrated the obsequies of poor Peter Barros.

When my time came to introduce evidence I produced Mr. Peter Barros upon the witness stand. A very worthy citizen. I identified him by his registration number. I identified him by his street address. And, lo and behold, Peter Barros testified upon the stand—not with any misgivings of doubt whatsoever, but emphatically and unequivocally—that he was alive. Not only alive then, but he went further and said that he was alive on election day and had voted. [Laughter.] Not only that, but he had a score of witnesses to corroborate his testimony that unquestionably he was alive.

That, Senators, is an example of the evidence that was adduced by the proponents of these charges.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. BONE. The Senator from Louisiana has referred to a party in New Orleans by the name of Williams.

Mr. OVERTON. Yes.

Mr. BONE. It is not quite plain to me, and I assume it is not plain to others, who this party is and what his connections are down there. Would the Senator make that plain for us? What are his business connections, as well as his political connections?

Mr. OVERTON. He is a politician. He now holds the position of a public-service commissioner in the State of Louisiana. Four years ago he ran for the office of mayor of New Orleans and was defeated.

Mr. BONE. Does the Senator mean that this gentleman is engaged in regulating the rates of private utilities?

Mr. OVERTON. He is. He is now running for the position of mayor of the city of New Orleans. I know very little about his private life. I assume that answers the question and gives the Senator from Washington the information he desires.

Mr. BONE. I assure the Senator from Louisiana I am not at all familiar with the conditions in New Orleans. I merely wished to know who this party is, whose name has been used so frequently, and particularly his business connections. The Senator has made it plain in saying that he is a politician and regulating the rates of private utilities.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Washington that this public-utilities commissioner is not elected over the State at large. He represents the district in which the city of New Orleans is situated. Is not that true?

Mr. OVERTON. He represents the district in which the city of New Orleans is situated. There are three public-service districts.

Mr. CONNALLY. There are three districts in the State; and the public-utilities commissioners are elected, not at large, but one from each district; and, as I understand, this Mr. Francis Williams represents the district in which New Orleans is located.

Mr. OVERTON. The junior Senator from Texas has dwelt for some time upon the question of dummy candidates. He has for the most part given a correct statement of the law in reference to dummy candidates. Dummy candidates are permitted by the law of Louisiana. They are permitted by a statute that was enacted in 1922—over 10 years ago—during the administration of John M. Parker. They have been used in different elections in the State of Louisiana for that period of 10 years by different candidates, different factions, and in various elections. Legislature after legislature has convened, governor after governor has been elected, and there has been no change in or amendment to the Louisiana primary election law in respect to the filing of candidates.

The Senator is in error in stating that a candidate for United States Senator cannot have other candidates file for the same office and cannot use them in filing the names of commissioners.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Louisiana yield?

Mr. OVERTON. If the Senator from Texas will let me finish the thought, I will yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. OVERTON. And perhaps when I shall have finished I shall have given the Senator the information he desires.

It is only when there are local candidates that other candidates cannot file the names of commissioners. The local candidates are those for the upper and lower houses of the Louisiana Legislature and for parochial and municipal offices. There were no State senatorial or legislative candidates in the September primary; it was not a State election. There were some local candidates for school boards. In one of the wards of a certain parish in the State of Louisiana friends supporting the candidacy of my opponent, Senator Broussard, filed 18 dummy candidates in that parish; but where there are no local candidates the candidate for United States Senator may file commissioners.

It is said, and correctly said by the committee, that Senator Broussard did not file any dummy candidates for that or for any other office. It is correctly said that I did not file any dummy candidates for the office of United States Senator or for any other office.

Now, just one step further. These dummy candidates were filed by various local candidates. When they are filed there is a remedy pointed out in the Louisiana statute. It gives to an opposing candidate for the same office, or any member of the committee, the right to go before the committee calling the election to object to the candidacy and have the committee pass upon it. No one else has that right. Neither I nor Senator Broussard could have gone before any committee in the State of Louisiana objecting to the candidacy of anyone. I had nothing to do with the entering of a single dummy candidate. I do not approve of the dummy candidate device. The record shows that I so said upon the stump; the record shows that I so said in my testimony; and I say so here. However, I had absolutely no control over it. I could not go before any tribunal and object to them. I could not go to the opposition and say to them, "You are friends of Broussard; your candidates are supporting Broussard, and you filed dummy candidates in the interest of your own campaign, and, perhaps, of his campaign; and I want you to withdraw them." They would have laughed me to scorn. I could not go to those who were supporting me, the different local candidates, the candidate for the office of public service commissioner and the others who filed dummy candidates and say to them, "You have got to withdraw these candidates or I will denounce you upon the stump."

We may talk about the purity of politics. Counting myself to be only an average Senator, and a meek and humble one at that, not ascribing to myself any virtues that I do not possess beyond those of the ordinary average man, it is well enough in the investigation, for instance, of the title to a seat in the United States Senate to bring out the local conditions brought about by candidates who had no control over them and then to deplore those conditions and to denounce them. However, when we are candidates for office we are confronted with a situation and not with a theory. I either had to go on with my campaign or withdraw from it, and I went on. I am practical enough to agree with Thomas Babington Macaulay when he said, "I prefer an acre in Middlesex to a principality in Utopia". We may dream this Utopian dream of absolutely pure politics, and we may thoroughly agree with the junior Senator from Louisiana that it is wrong—it is all wrong—that there should be contributions on the part of any State employees toward any political campaign.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator means to refer, I think, to "the junior Senator from Texas" and not to the junior Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. I beg pardon of the Senator from Texas, but in spite of what the Senator from Texas has had to say in reference to political conditions in Louisiana, I venture the suggestion that in alluding to him as "the Senator from Louisiana" I perhaps paid him a compliment, and this with all due respect to the magnificent and imperial State which with so much honor and credit he represents in the United States Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). The occupants of the galleries will refrain from any demonstrations of approval or disapproval.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, it may be all wrong that employees contribute to campaign funds, but no one need shake his gory locks at me when it comes to that suggestion. The campaign contributions to my campaign were set out by my campaign managers at the very outset of this investigation. This committee has ransacked the State of Louisiana from the Arkansas line to the Gulf through a staff of investigators—so euphoniously called, but in reality detectives—who undertook to unearth every kind of evidence anywhere that could be found to show that the statements which I had filed were incorrect. In the State of Louisiana there are thousands upon thousands of State employees, hundreds of whom have been discharged from employment since my election, and yet out of that vast array of employees, notwithstanding the persistent efforts of these investigators and the appeals made to the citizens of Louisiana through the public press, they were unable to show one single contribution made to my campaign and entering into the coffers of the committee, except the contributions which I set forth through my campaign managers in the report filed in connection with this proceeding.

Contributions were made to me by personal and political friends, some 14 in number. There were only three employees who testified that, although they made contributions after my election, they thought they were contributing to the Overton campaign. One of them, Mr. Welsh, was shown to have been false in his statements in other particulars. Another was a Mr. Harris. The name of the other witness I do not recall, but I am perfectly willing to ascribe to them the best of motives in giving that testimony, because immediately after my election the Times-Picayune, the Daily State, and other local papers in the State of Louisiana declared that contributions to my campaign were being raised by solicitation from the employees of the State of Louisiana, and when they did make a contribution perhaps some of them thought they were contributing to the Overton campaign, but the overwhelming weight of the testimony shows the contrary.

Those who got the contributions, those who solicited them from employees, those who turned them in, showed that none of them were ever solicited for or received by the Overton campaign managers; but they were solicited, for what? First, they were solicited for what is known as the Welfare Relief Fund in the city of New Orleans, beginning in July 1931, and ending in April 1932. Second, in order to cover what is known here as the Allen deficit. That was a deficit arising out of the Allen gubernatorial campaign, occurring in January 1932; and to cover certain other deficits connected with the Louisiana Democratic organization. But only three witnesses have testified that any of those contributions were made or intended to be made to my campaign. On the other hand, those who did collect campaign funds for me, and those who contributed them testified that they contributed them out of their own pockets, and they stated to whom they were given, and an account was rendered. There was a third collection. At the time immediately following my election when the two great national parties had their candidates afield an effort was made to raise a campaign fund for the Roosevelt campaign in the State of Louisiana. It was known as the Roosevelt Victory Fund. Requests were made on the part of citizens to make contributions to the campaign. These requests were not bringing such great results. Thereupon those in charge of different departments of the State of Louisiana were appealed to raise money for the Roosevelt Victory Campaign Fund.

The junior Senator from Texas placed witnesses on the stand in November and December to prove that those city employees and State employees contributed to the Roosevelt victory campaign fund. It may have been all wrong. It may have been wrong for the National Democratic Committee to have accepted such contributions. It may have been wrong for the National Republican Committee to seek, as I understand they did seek, to obtain contributions from officeholders under the Federal Government. But these are the facts. So far as my own contributions are concerned, they did not come from any State employee, but they came from my personal and political friends.

The junior Senator from Texas said—though I do not find any such presumption as that being indulged in by the committee in its report—that he is laboring under a strong presumption that "OVERTON got contributions from employees." I shall ask the junior Senator from Texas to point to the testimony of a single witness, aside from the three I have mentioned, that goes to show that any State employee testified that he ever contributed to my campaign. So much for that.

Mr. President, the junior Senator from Texas has stated that I was nominated. I was nominated. Out of 306,000 votes polled in the State I received a majority in excess of 56,500. I carried the city of New Orleans by over 25,000 votes. I carried the rest of the State, known as the "country parishes", by over 30,000 votes. I carried 48 out of the 64 parishes of the State of Louisiana. I carried 7 out of the 8 congressional districts. I carried north Louisiana and south Louisiana, northeast Louisiana and southeast Louisiana, northwest Louisiana and southwest Louisiana, east Louisiana and west Louisiana.

The State of Louisiana may be divided along any geographical line, and yet I received a majority in each subdivision. I carried the parishes where dummy candidates were filed, and I carried the parishes where they were not filed. I ran as well if not better in the nondummy parishes than I did in the dummy parishes. In the Fourth and Fifth and Eighth Congressional Districts there were no dummy candidates filed or even suggested. I carried all three of those districts. I carried 25 out of the 29 parishes constituting those four districts. Therefore, Mr. President, I was nominated.

Could my opponent have claimed the nomination, had be been nominated instead of myself, had he been deprived or cheated of his nomination by the perpetration of fraud or corruption or irregularity, he had his remedy under the primary election law of Louisiana. That law gives the right of action to any candidate who claims to have been nominated to go into court and allege the fact, and, if he is shown to have been nominated, he will be so declared by the judgment of the court.

Senator Broussard not only did not claim the nomination in the courts of Louisiana, but he stated here upon the floor of the Senate in February of 1933 that he did not claim and could not claim the nomination. In the hearing held in October 1932 in New Orleans his attorney, Mr. Rightor, stated:

> I concede that Senator Broussard, neither by the courts of Louisiana, the political committee of Louisiana, nor any judicial or legislative body, can be declared nominated.

Let me say, Mr. President, that Senator Broussard not only had his remedy in the courts if he had been nominated, but the primary election law of Louisiana bristles with penalties for the perpetration of fraud or corruption or irregularities or a violation of most of its provisions. There was not one single charge made against any individual, no affidavit, no indictment, no prosecution of anyone in any court or parish of the State of Louisiana, by reason of any charge of fraud or irregularity or illegality in the September 1932 nominating primary in the State of Louisiana.

Following that, in the general election I had no opposition. Those charges had been broadcast throughout the State of Louisiana. They had been published in the different newspapers of the State. But no opposing party ran any candidate against me, no one ran independently, and out of 249,189 votes cast I received all with the exception of 3 scattering votes against me.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator explain to the Senate the law of Louisiana with regard to how an independent candidate or the candidate of any other organization could have run against the Senator in the general election?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes. He could be nominated by his political party, either through primary or convention. He could be nominated on petition. In addition to that the ballots have a blank space in which the name of any other candidate can be written by the voter. There are three methods of nomination, according to my recollection.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is there any requirement of law as to when such a convention should be held? In other words, was it possible, after the Senator was nominated in the primary, for anybody else or any other organization to have met and nominated a candidate for the Senate against the Senator?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes; they could have.

Mr. CONNALLY. Could a private individual, if he wanted to run as an independent, have gotten his name on the ticket against the Senator in the general election? How would an independent candidate have gotten on the ticket?

Mr. OVERTON. By nominating petition.

Mr. CONNALLY. How many signers are required for that?

Mr. OVERTON. I do not remember. It is not very many, but I do not remember that detail.

Mr. President, notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding that I was conceded to be the nominee of my party, notwithstanding that I had no opposition in the general election, notwithstanding there has never been any contest involving either my nomination or my election, notwithstanding that I presented my credentials to the United States Senate and they were received and I was sworn in without opposition, there has been an investigation of 15 months in respect to my nomination. That investigation was never prompted by any purpose to investigate the legality of my nomination. The junior Senator from Texas will recall that when these charges were preferred and he, in company with the then junior Senator from New Mexico, Mr. Bratton, went to the city of New Orleans in October 1932 to conduct a hearing, he and Senator Bratton called upon the proponents of the charges to produce their evidence and their proof. They had filed long documents, undertaking to challenge the legality of my nomination, and they had sworn to them; and yet, when they were called upon to produce their witnesses and to produce their evidence, they stated to the subcommittee that they did not have a single witness, and they did not have any evidence; and why? Because it was not their purpose at the outset to make an investigation of my nomination and election; but it was the purpose to conduct, through the instrumentality of this committee, an anti-Long campaign in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator said that these charges presented to Senator Bratton and myself in October 1932 were sworn to. I think it ought to be made to appear that they were sworn to on information and belief only.

Mr. OVERTON. Why, there has been nothing at all in this investigation except information and baseless charges.

Mr. CONNALLY. What I meant was those who made the charges swore to them on information and belief, and did not contend that they had personal knowledge of the matters charged, but invited the committee to send out investigators and find out.

Mr. OVERTON. The Senator is correct; and I am wondering whether the junior Senator from Texas will agree with me that throughout the course of this investigation, barring the time when he and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] were examining the witnesses, the principal witnesses and almost the exclusive witnesses were the witnesses known as "Mr. He says" and "She says" and "They say", and "I done heard where somebody said so-and-so once upon a time"?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas has already indicated that in the course of the investigation the committee did not observe the strict rules of evidence obtaining in the courts but that the committee, in order to get all available information, had disregarded those rules and permitted the testimony to take a wide sweep, consisting, of course, of hearsay, and frequently of rumor, and things of that kind; and that is as far as the Senator wants to go. I should not care to become involved in an argument with the Senator about that, but I want to say that when Senator Bratton and the junior Senator from Texas went to New Orleans in October 1932 and these charges were filed by Senator Broussard it was then argued by the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. OVERTON] and his attorneys that these charges were demurrable.

Mr. OVERTON. Only on one ground, were they not, if I may be permitted to interrupt the Senator, and that was on the ground that they were vague and general and there were no specific allegations?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true.

Mr. OVERTON. And we were simply asking for information.

Mr. CONNALLY. But what I was getting at was that the Senator's side contended that they were demurrable for those reasons; but Senator Bratton and the junior Senator from Texas at that time ruled that we would not hold the investigation according to the strict rules, and that we would proceed with it and not dismiss it on any technical ground of demurrer or general or special exception. I wanted to make that clear, because it was at the invitation of Senator Broussard that this investigation was begun, and we opened the gates wide; and we gave every opportunity at that time and since that time, so far as the committee was able to give it, to anybody to hear and present these charges without technical rules of evidence or technical rules of pleading.

Mr. OVERTON. The fact remains, Mr. President, that the charges were preferred; and I am not saying it because I have regretted any investigation. I have, of course, regretted the fact that any charges were made reflecting on my title to a seat in the United States Senate; but, once they were made, I desired an investigation of those charges, and not an investigation of extraneous matters. The fact remains that these charges were preferred, and an investigation ordered, when there was no question about my nomination, no question about my election, no question about my credentials; and when those who preferred the charges were called upon by the subcommittee to produce their proof, they stated that they had no proof whatsoever.

I do not recall whether or not the junior Senator from Texas made any statement—I think he did—to the effect that no evidence was adduced reflecting upon my character or my standing.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not think the Senator from Texas made any statement with regard to those particular words. The Senator from Texas said that there was no charge and there was no evidence of probative character that connected the junior Senator from Louisiana with participation, personally or directly, in any fraud in the election. That was the matter we were inquiring about; not as to the Senator's standing generally.

Mr. OVERTON. I think the junior Senator from Texas will agree with me that amongst all the hundreds and hundreds of witnesses who were examined, and in all the thousands and thousands of pages of testimony that were taken, there was not a single witness who made any statement or any remark reflecting upon my character, upon my standing, or upon my conduct. If there are such statements, the record is there, and I should like any member of the committee, or any Member of the United States Senate, to point to any such declaration on the part of any witness. On the contrary, Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for making these personal references—one of the questions, probably, that the Members of the Senate would like to consider is whether or not I am worthy of occupying the seat that I presently hold—on the contrary, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], who had read the record of the prior hearings, and who was present at the last hearing, stated in the midst of the hearing, on October 14, 1933, as follows:

> I have listened carefully and have never heard one man or woman say a word against the character, standing, or fitness of Senator OVERTON to sit in the United States Senate. Not a man has said it, not even Senator Broussard or anyone else.

Following that, the committee placed upon the stand Mr. Allen Sholars, a prominent lawyer of the city of Monroe, who is opposed to me politically; and he made the statement that he had known me since boyhood, and that it was inconceivable to him that I should at any time be guilty of any fraud, corruption, or intimidation.

Mrs. Ruffin G. Pleasant, wife of ex-Governor Pleasant, both of whom were opposed to me politically, upon the witness stand made this statement:

> I would have supported Senator OVERTON, and I have a great admiration for him personally, had he not alined himself under the banner of HUEY P. LONG.

Mr. George C. Kernion, a prominent lawyer of New Orleans and a member of the so-called "Honest Election League", made this statement:

> I would have supported OVERTON for any office in the State of Louisiana if he had not hooked up with Huey.

Had I not been alined under the banner of HUEY P. LONG; had I not "hooked up with Huey."

That, as I stated, is the head and front of my offending. That is the reason why these charges have been preferred and this investigation has been requested. If it had not been for my alinement with the senior Senator from Louisiana, as the record well shows, the charges would not have been preferred; or, if I had divorced myself politically from him, the charges would have been dropped.

There goes with that left-handed compliment on the part of these witnesses another imputation. You do not find any evidence of it in the record, but you find statements to that effect published from time to time in the newspapers, and in some having a national circulation, that I am politically subservient to the senior Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. President, I hope that such an imputation is too absurd and too ridiculous to require any answer upon my part. I have been active in the political life of Louisiana for over a quarter of a century. I had never held any office until in 1931 I was elected to the House of Representatives. I have taken an active part in the politics of Louisiana and have tried to do my part in aiding those who had charge of the administration of its affairs.

I campaigned in 1912 in the State of Louisiana for Gov. Luther E. Hall, who was elected in that campaign, and I helped him in his administration. I never asked him a favor.

In 1916 I campaigned in Louisiana for Ruffin G. Pleasant, who was elected governor, and undertook to aid him in the administration of his affairs of the State. I never asked him a favor and received none.

In 1920, when Hon. John M. Parker, advertised throughout the United States as one of my bitter political foes, announced his candidacy for the governorship of Louisiana he requested me to preside at his opening meeting and sound the keynote of his campaign. I did so, and during his administration I never asked and never received a favor.

In 1924 I campaigned for Gov. Henry L. Fuqua, who was elected Governor, and never did I ask any favor at the hands of his administration.

In 1928, when HUEY P. LONG announced for the governorship, he, too, requested that I preside at his opening meeting and sound the keynote of his campaign, and I did so. I digress for a moment to say that in sounding the keynote of his campaign I stated that for years and years Louisiana had been under different gubernatorial administrations, that I had seen them come and had seen them go, and that little had been accomplished for the people of my native State, but that I felt that Senator LONG had the vision and the energy and the courage to bring about a different order of things in the State of Louisiana.

Senator LONG had declared that he was going to drive from office those who had been in power so long in the State of Louisiana and was going to undertake to infuse new blood into the body politic of that State. He declared that he was going to impose just taxes upon certain corporate interests which had theretofore escaped their just proportion of the burden of taxation, and use the avails of those taxes for the benefit of the people of the State of Louisiana. And he did so.

As Governor, HUEY LONG gave to the State of Louisiana not only the best and most constructive administration that State has ever had, but he accomplished more for the State of Louisiana than any or all Governors within my experience had done for it. He built up its public institutions, he paved its roads, he bridged its streams, he improved its eleemosynary institutions, and I say to the Senate that when the senior Senator from Louisiana has been gathered to his fathers and when those who now so persistently and cruelly undertake to persecute him politically and to wreck his career have long since been moldering in the ground the result of his constructive program as Governor of Louisiana will still live to bless and glorify that State. So much for that.

When my opponents undertake to say that I would crook the pregnant hinges of the knee to the senior Senator from Louisiana or to anyone else with whom I have been allied in the past politically or whom I have aided, they are in error. Perhaps one illustration will suffice. When I came here during the special session of Congress and was inducted into the office of United States Senator I played a meek and humble part, as became my ability and the newness of my presence in this august body. It will be recalled that the senior Senator from Louisiana was reputed to be fighting the Federal administration. It will probably be recalled by some of the Senators that with one exception—and that was in respect to the veterans' pay cut—I upheld the President's program, and that I took occasion to say to the Senate in the course of some remarks I was making on the farm-relief bill that I considered it the duty of Senators, Democratic and Republican, to go as far as they could conscientiously go in upholding the program of our President, for the reason that he had received, as it were, a mandate from the people of this Nation to undertake to lift it out of the slough of despondency and depression and despair into which it had fallen.

While I am upon that subject, permit me to say that I hope that I shall, at all times, have sufficient regard for my office as United States Senator not to follow blindly or slavishly the suggestions of anyone, high or low, be he President of the United States and the titular head of my party, be he the majority leader of my party in this body, who so ably represents the democracy of our Nation upon the floor of the United States Senate, or be he a political leader from the State of Louisiana, or a ward leader, or the head of any organization.

Mr. President, the animus back of this entire investigation has been an effort, not to get me, but to get LONG, and in undertaking to accomplish that purpose, his opponents have used my nomination and election as an excuse, and in undertaking to accomplish that purpose they have sought in the public print, through lying pens, and lying tongues, to belittle me, and to hold me up to public ridicule.

Mr. President, does the Senate want better evidence of the character of the opposition than what this investigation itself affords? The junior Senator from Texas has given it to the Senate in part. When the committee first went to Louisiana to conduct the hearing, in October 1932, Senator Connally and Senator Bratton, sitting upon the subcommittee, said that the investigation would be confined to an inquiry into my nomination and election, and those urging the investigation stated that they had no evidence to offer and no proof. That is not what they wanted. They wanted an investigation into LONG and his political career.

In February 1932 a subcommittee, headed by the late Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Howell], went into the State of Louisiana, accompanied by an attorney from the city of Washington, who so far forgot his duty as a representative of a committee of the United States Senate undertaking to find out the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth with respect to the subject of its inquiry, that he converted himself not into a prosecutor but into a veritable persecutor not of me but of the senior Senator from Louisiana. Every witness who had any canard or story or lie to tell about LONG, anybody who had any story that had been used in campaign after campaign in the past in Louisiana, anyone who had any whispered rumor which he could reveal through hearsay evidence or in any way was given liberty to take the stand and was examined at length, and the private and political life of LONG was gone into from the time of his young manhood up to the time of the hearing, his first race for the public service commission, his second race for the public service commission, his race for the governorship, his election as governor, his attempted impeachment, his campaign for the United States Senate. Then, when the Senate subcommittee composed of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], went on the last visitation into the State of Louisiana and made the statement that the inquiry must be confined to the allegations of fraud and corruption and irrigularity attendant upon my nomination, confined to the 1932 election, what did our opponents do? These poor, defeated, disgruntled, and lost souls withdrew from the contest!

First, Mr. Burt Henry, chairman of an intervening organization, self-styled the Honest Election League—Mr. Burt Henry, from whose face, when I got him upon the stand, I tore the mask of hypocrisy—stated under oath that the Honest Election League was a nonpartisan league in the city of New Orleans, and yet upon the witness stand he had to admit that all of the 15 members of its executive council, and all of the members of its administrative board, and everyone connected with it, as far as he knew, were active supporters of Senator Broussard.

Mr. Burt Henry withdrew from the contest. Then Mr. Edward Rightor, attorney for Mr. Broussard, got up and withdrew, and then Senator Broussard in person withdrew. As each one of them arose to sing his swan song, each indulged in a criticism of the members of the committee of the United States Senate that is not only totally unjustified but will be shocking to anyone who will read what the record shows. Those who are back of the charges against me in my election arose and said, one after another, that this committee was a partial committee; that it was there for the purpose of whitewashing my election; and, as they proceeded to excoriate and denounce the members of the committee, as the junior Senator from Texas has said, their backers were there urging them on to the contest, while cries of "Cowards" and "Yellow" came from the lips of their claquers.

I do not know of any parallel to it in human history, or in literature, unless perhaps it is the scene that is pictured by Milton in his Paradise Lost, when the demons of hell were lying prostrate upon the burning marl, after their defeat, and were called together in Stygian conclave, and they arose one by one and hurled their defies against constituted authority, uttered their creeds of hate, and declared universal and unrelenting warfare upon mankind.

As these modern Belials and Beelzebubs and Mammons and Molochs arose upon this occasion in that investigation in the city of New Orleans, they, too, sang their hymns of hate, denounced constituted authority, and declared everlasting warfare upon anyone who dared, or whom they thought dared to cross them in their purpose.

Mr. President, I have delayed the Senate longer than I had expected. I think, if I may with propriety do so, that I can draw some conclusions that may be of benefit to the United States Senate from the experiences that I have undergone in this investigation.

It is my conviction, Mr. President, that there ought not to be an investigation of any election by any committee, unless it be done upon cause shown, and by direction of the Senate itself.

I do not think that one elected to the United States Senate, and sent here by his sovereign State, ought to be subjected to a 15 months' investigation by reason of the statement of a defeated opponent, who admits his defeat, and who declares that his allegations are made entirely upon information and belief.

I think there ought to be a senatorial decision upon the question of whether or not there should be an investigation of an election, unless it be a contested election, perhaps, and sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I think another suggestion may be made, and that is that no committees undertake to investigate any nominating primaries, whether they be primaries of the Democratic Party or of the Republican Party, or any other party, unless, perchance, they are intimately connected with a general election, where the right of a seat to the Senate is actually contested.

I will make this further suggestion, that whenever a Senate committee is sent out to make an investigation, especially a political investigation, that it be armed with sufficient authority to command proper respect for its proceedings.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. CONNALLY rose.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator from Texas desire to respond to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CONNALLY. I wish to respond in just about three words.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana seemed to challenge my statement that my personal belief was that a good portion of the campaign funds given to his campaign came from assessments of State employees. My reason for making that statement was this: That among the contributors reported by Senator Broussard was, for instance, Abe L. Shushan, New Orleans, La., $1,000. Mr. Shushan is the head of one of the State departments, is he not?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes. Not only that, but he is connected with the administration that I helped very much to put in power, and with the prior administration that I aided very much in putting in power, and one whom I have known for years and with whom I have been politically associated. That fact applies, also, to other contributors that may be mentioned.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Shushan, who gave a thousand dollars, was a State officer whose employees had made contributions to Mr. Shushan; Mr. Maestri, who gave $2,500, was the head of a State department to whom employees had turned over money from their salaries for political purposes. O. K. Allen, who gave $2,900, was the Governor of the State, head of all of the executive departments, and these employees had been assessed. Mr. J. M. Nugent, who gave $750, was on the highway commission, I believe. Was he not?

Mr. OVERTON. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. The members of the highway commission had been assessed, and possibly some of those members contributed.

What the Senator from Texas meant to say was that this assessment having been made in September, on September salaries, and the primaries having been in September, he believes that those State officers, when they pretended to contribute of their own private funds to Senator OVERTON'S campaign, were in fact turning over the assessments which they had collected from their employees. The committee makes no specific finding on that, because there was no direct proof, but the committee cannot close its eyes and its conscience to deductions and inference when they are supported by the testimony and the proof. The Senator from Texas merely expressed his individual conviction that these contributions of the parties named were not made out of their own pockets, but were first collected from their employees, and then turned over to the campaign fund as their personal contribution.

I wish to say that while the Senator is still on the floor, so that he can make any reply he wishes to it. By that I do not mean that the junior Senator from Louisiana had knowledge of those facts, or instigated them, or inspired them, but the Senator from Texas does believe that those parties, being a part of the political machine of Louisiana, of a State organization controlled by Senator LONG, assessed their employees, and he believes that that money, after finding its way into the hands of those State officers, was then turned over to the campaign fund as the private contributions of those individuals.

Mr. OVERTON. Permit me to say in reply to the junior Senator from Texas, that I not only have no knowledge that those contributions were obtained through assessments upon employees, but as far as this record shows, and as far as I know, no one else possesses such knowledge. There is not the slightest bit of evidence in the record that those gentlemen who contributed to my campaign ever obtained those contributions from their employees, or solicited contributions from their employees, with the exception of three isolated witnesses, to whose testimony I have heretofore referred.

The junior Senator from Texas indulges in a presumption, but I am quite sure that the junior Senator from Texas wishes to be perfectly fair, and I should say that he is perfectly fair in his statement to the Senate, according to the views that he takes; but he will certainly agree with me that it is a presumption that is not supported by, at least, any direct proof, and is indulged in by the Senator by reason of the fact that some of those who contributed to my campaign held positions officially in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OVERTON. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas explicitly stated that there was no direct, positive evidence that these funds were of that kind, but the Senator from Texas knows that matters can be proved by circumstances just as conclusively as they can be proved by eyeball testimony, and the Senator from Texas contends, from the circumstance that the collections occurred in September and that the primary occurred almost contemporaneously, that the assessments were turned over to the State officers, and that the State officers then turned the money over to Senator OVERTON'S campaign manager, Mr. Weiss, and that Mr. Weiss was the pay-off man, who made a contribution himself of $500. The Senator from Texas, as a very mediocre lawyer, thinks that he is warranted in the conclusion, in his own mind, that the funds assessed against the employees found their way into the campaign fund.

Mr. OVERTON. While the Senator is on his feet, will he answer two questions which I should like to propound to him?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not want to become involved as a witness.

Mr. OVERTON. I am not asking the Senator to testify as a witness.

Mr. CONNALLY. The witnesses have been treated so roughly by the Senator from Louisiana that I do not care to get into that category.

Mr. OVERTON. I am merely asking the Senator to testify from his familiarity with the record. Is it not a fact that campaign contributions were taken for the welfare relief fund in the city of New Orleans? Is it not a fact that some $300,000, during the course of pretty nearly a year, were contributed by different employees to the welfare fund of the city of New Orleans?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas will state that, so far as the city employees are concerned, that is true. All the testimony that was available was that they had contributed the deductions from their salaries for welfare or relief purposes. The Senator from Texas, though, was referring to State employees when he said they had been assessed 10 percent of their salaries in September 1932, and then the money had been turned over to the heads of departments; and the Senator from Texas believed that the assessments then went from the heads of those departments into the campaign fund. The Senator from Texas wants to be fair to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. OVERTON. I am sure the Senator does.

Mr. CONNALLY. And the Senator from Texas is trying to state the facts as he recalls them.

Mr. OVERTON. I am sure of that, but the Senator had become somewhat confused during the course of the inquiry in New Orleans on the subject of contributions, and I should like to get the facts straight in the RECORD. Is it not a fact that not only the city employees but the State employees of the city of New Orleans contributed to that welfare fund?

Mr. CONNALLY. That was the testimony; but the amusing thing was——

Mr. OVERTON. Is it not also true that contributions were made by State employees to the welfare-fund deficit, and the Allen deficit, and some other deficits connected with the Louisiana Democratic Association?

Mr. CONNALLY. There was a great deal of testimony to that effect. The amusing thing about it was——

Mr. OVERTON. Before we get to "the amusing thing"—because I am rather serious about it—is it not also true that the third collection from employees was the collection made from the city and State employees, as shown by countless witnesses who were put on the stand by the Senator, for the purpose of aiding the victory fund or the Roosevelt campaign fund?

Mr. CONNALLY. The committee sets forth in its report that it was stated and claimed that a large portion of the money which was contributed was used to help pay a deficit in the Democratic national campaign fund; and the Senator from Texas so stated on the floor, but as to the relation between the relief administration and the relief contributions and the Senator's campaign fund in September, the Senator from Texas examined as witnesses State employees who had made contributions. He would ask them, "Did you make a contribution of 10 percent of your salary for September?" "Yes." "Did you make that to Senator Overton's campaign?" "No", they would say, "for relief and for Governor Allen's deficit." In each case the witness had the information ready and available; the contribution was always for Allen's deficit and for relief, but in no case for Senator OVERTON'S, except once, when a man claimed that he was approached for that purpose. The amusing part of it was that witnesses all had the same tale to tell, and they told it very accurately and very quickly, according to what a lawyer who has been trained in the courts somewhat would understand to mean that they had been more or less schooled—not by the Senator necessarily—not to admit that they ever made any contributions to the Senator's campaign fund.

Mr. OVERTON. I infer the Senator means not only "not necessarily" but "not at all."

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not mean to reflect upon the Senator, but I did get the idea that the witnesses' testimony was of that character; that it looked as though they had been schooled and instructed to be sure and never testify that they had given anything to the Overton campaign.

Mr. OVERTON. The junior Senator from Texas will remember that I expressed the apprehension when, under the necessities of the situation, he was compelled to descend from his position as a judge upon the day that he undertook the examination of the committee's witnesses and the cross-examination of my own that he might unconsciously become so prejudiced in favor of his own work as to draw erroneous conclusions. If I may repeat, as to the character of examination to which the Senator refers, the witnesses who were put upon the stand were largely his own, and also many of those who were cross-examined were my witnesses, and the questions asked by the junior Senator from Texas were along this line, "Did you contribute to the welfare fund?" "Yes, sir." "Did you contribute to any other fund?" "Yes, sir." "What other fund?" "The Allen deficit." "Did you contribute to any other fund?" "Yes; I contributed to the Roosevelt fund." Those were the three political funds to which contributions were made; and the answers of witnesses were in response to direct interrogatories propounded by the junior Senator from Texas.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is perfectly obvious that we will not be able to return to executive session today for further consideration of the St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty. Under such circumstances I have not wanted the day to pass without a statement of what I believe to be treaty facts in respect to the major challenge lodged yesterday by the able senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], even though I must temporarily interrupt legislative business to make this statement. Such an important proposition is involved, and I think the statement is so completely at variance with the facts as I understand them, that I must crave the Senate's attention for a few moments to present the opposite thesis, so that they may travel together in their challenge to the country's attention.

Mr. President, unfortunately the RECORD this morning does not carry the transcription of the eloquent speech made by the able and distinguished senior Senator from Illinois. Therefore I cannot refer specifically to the RECORD; I can only refer to the newspaper reports, although the reports will be recognized as quite accurate by those who attended the debate yesterday. I content myself with identifying his theme as follows, reading the headline from the New York Herald Tribune of this morning:

> Waterway pact hit in the Senate as British war aid.

I will read one sentence:

> Senator JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS, Democrat, of Illinois, submitted the thought "that the St. Lawrence seaway project would provide a military avenue through the United States for Great Britain."

Mr. President, I must insist that the contention submitted by the able Senator from Illinois is without sustained justification. Since it is without this justification, I think it should not go to the country without the contrary demonstration that there is at least ground for challenge to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VAN NUYS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Michigan intends to discuss the matter further, particularly in reference to the statement made by the Senator from Illinois, would he object to my sending for the Senator from Illinois? He is not now on the floor.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I may say to the Senator from Utah that I notified the Senator from Illinois that I would speak this afternoon, and I have informed him of the general nature of my rejoinder.

Mr. President, it is the contention of those who defend this treaty, it is the contention of the State Department, as it is also the contention of the President of the United States, that this treaty does not give Great Britain and Canada one additional contemporary navigation right in Lake Michigan or any of the other Great Lakes or their connecting waters. Under the treaty of 1909, which is now in existence and which has been honored continuously since that date, Great Britain and Canada have every right of navigation in Lake Michigan which they will obtain contemporarily under the pending St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty. It seems to me that that statement is incontrovertible. Here is the only change that occurs in the prospectus: At the present time this existing right under the treaty of 1909 is revocable by either nation upon 1 year's notice. Under the new treaty the right becomes irrevocable, and, of course, it is balanced by an irrevocable right to the United States to navigate the important Welland Canal. That right, I repeat, at present is revocable upon 1 year's notice. The only difference then in the status in respect to the rights of navigation in the Great Lakes is the single proposition that the right today is revocable upon 1 year's notice, and the right day after tomorrow, if the treaty is ratified, will be irrevocable.

Therefore if there is any menace from a British invasion under the conjured theory of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, that danger has existed continuously for 25 years and it exists today under the treaty of 1909, and it cannot be urged in logic that any new menace now should militate against the new treaty. If anybody thinks that the King can move on Chicago because of the pending treaty, he must admit that the King can move on Chicago under the existing treaty of 1909, and we must give the King a year's notice before the existing right can be denied.

That is not all. There is another treaty in existence. It has been in existence for more than a century. It is one of the most precious treaties in the entire portfolio of American diplomatic engagements. It is known as the "Rush-Bagot agreement of 1817", proclaimed by President James Monroe and Secretary of State John Quincy Adams on April 28, 1818. Under this contract, Mr. President, the Government of the United States and the Government of Canada, the latter speaking through the British Government itself, mutually agreed to a complete limitation of all naval armaments of every name and nature upon these inland waters. There has never been a moment since 1818 when that agreement has even been threatened with a violation. There has never been a moment in more than a century when the Canadian border has been other than a friendly, unarmed, unfortified dividing line between two good neighbors. I cannot conceive how, under the terms of the treaty of 1818, anyone can now conjecture any such threat as that which was submitted to the Senate upon yesterday as a reason for the defeat of the pending St. Lawrence Seaway Treaty. There is no such menace. There can be no such jeopardy. It is denied by the letter of our mutual engagements. It is denied by the mutual spirit of our peoples. It is denied by realism and common sense. I submit these observations with the greatest respect for my distinguished friend from Illinois.

If it be said in a final burst of the imagination that in the event of unthinkable war between England or Canada and the United States the treaties will become scraps of paper, then let it be said as a practical fact that when this project has been completed the locks in the canal opposite Barnhart Island in the international section are all under American sovereignty. Let it be said, too, that two thirds of the channel of the international section equally is exclusively under the American flag; and if in the untoward event that these treaties would be torn up in such an unthinkable conflict, the absolute physical control of the situation rests exclusively in the hands of the Government of the United States. Then, as is usual in war, the stronger force will prevail, regardless of what we may do in respect to the pending project.

I wanted to submit that exhibit promptly lest the country should proceed to groundless fears upon the basis of what I conceive to be a misconception affecting the purport of the pending engagement.

Just one other exhibit. Another of the favorite attacks upon the pending treaty and the pending project is the constant persistent implication that the estimates of the Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers in the War Department are undependable, and that instead of a St. Lawrence project costing approximately $540,000,000 we shall confront a project running into the billions. In the course of the debate yesterday I casually submitted an exhibit upon that point. Because of the fact that the observations of the Senator from Illinois have been withheld from the RECORD until later—I say it not complainingly, because it is frequently and appropriately done—the telegram from Col. Hugh L. Cooper is not yet officially in the RECORD. Colonel Cooper is one of the great engineers of this world. He is fresh from a great hydroelectric development in Russia. He has been quoted time and time and time again as a favorite authority of the critics and foes of the pending treaty, quoted as their favorite authority to demonstrate that the figures of the War Department engineers are unreliable, because Colonel Cooper at some time has said that a St. Lawrence project would cost well in excess of $1,000,000,000. Let us test the substance of these complaints. Let the decisive witness be this allegedly adverse expert himself.

Mr. President, I could not believe that engineering is such an unexact science that reputable engineers could so far disagree as Colonel Cooper and General Markham, of the War Department, appear upon the surface to disagree if they were talking about the same project. I undertook to telegraph Colonel Cooper upon last Monday and I asked him the question whether his estimates were based upon the same project as that upon which General Markham's figures were based. Colonel Cooper responded very frankly, very conclusively, and, I submit, in a fashion which should end this particular misconception for keeps. I quote the telegram from Colonel Cooper:

> Answering your telegram regarding alleged differences between my estimated cost of St. Lawrence project and War Department estimates, my estimate of $1,450,000,000 made in December 1920 after several years of intensive field and office study included cost of developing 6,600,000 horsepower between Lake Erie and Montreal, whereas the War Department estimate you probably refer to takes in only the two-stage power development aggregating 2,200,000 horsepower in the International Rapids division of the St. Lawrence River.

Thus we discover, in the first place, that Colonel Cooper's figures are 14 years old and are in no sense the up-to-date information for which the foes of the treaty constantly plead. But that is secondary. Here is the vital and conclusive thing.

We have Colonel Cooper's own testimony that this gargantuan estimate of nearly $1,500,000,000, which has so often been flung prejudicially against the St. Lawrence seaway project, is an estimate upon a project which is three times as big as the project actually before the Senate. It is no wonder that the figures therefore are three times as large as those submitted by the War Department and by Colonel Markham. I hope that will end perpetually the use of Colonel Cooper's figures against the treaty now pending. It might even serve as a wholesome warning against too much credulity in accepting other data urged against the official recommendations of the authorities of the Government of the United States.

I submit this further exhibit upon this essential point, because it is essential that we should know that we can proceed within the estimates. I submitted to General Markham himself on yesterday the challenge as to whether or not he can defend his record as an estimator of these great projects. I am answered by General Markham under date of January 16 in a powerful letter, from which I quote:

For a long period of years this Department—

He is speaking for the office of the Chief of Engineers of the War Department—

For a long period of years this Department has been charged by Congress with the duty of reporting on the cost and advisability of proposed improvements of rivers and harbors. Under its long-established policy these estimates are especially scrutinized to insure that they are safe—

Let me repeat that:

Under its long-established policy these estimates are especially scrutinized to insure that they are safe, are based on conditions to be anticipated for some years after the report, and contain reasonable provisions for adverse conditions.

Now listen:

The Department considers it preferable to make estimates positively safe and later to report to Congress a saving under the estimate after the completion of the project rather than to make the estimate too small and to later be obliged to submit further estimated funds after the full amount has been allotted.

I submit to the Senate that this is a sound basis of engineering practice, and that it invites the continuing confidence of this Senate.

I continue General Markham's letter:

I have had an examination made of 43 projects adopted by Congress in recent years in which the project has been carried out without subsequent modification in accordance with the project estimated in the report. The aggregate estimated cost of these is $56,332,745. The actual cost of completing the works was $53,554,284.

In other words, upon 43 major projects the estimates of the War Department, upon which we depend in respect to the St. Lawrence project, proved to be $3,000,000 more than the actual bids which subsequently were received under which the work was completed. The official estimates were on the safe side. I believe they continue to be on the safe side in respect to the seaway project.

I continue the reading:

Some of the major projects included in the list—

To which I have just referred—are the improvement for deep-draft shipping of the channel in New York Harbor lying between Staten Island and the New Jersey shore, and known as the "New York and New Jersey Channels". The estimate made in February 1920 was $10,400,000. The work was completed in 1932 at a cost of $9,696,487.

In other words, the work was done for about a million dollars less than the estimate submitted by the engineers—the engineers whom we have summoned to justify the figures that we submit as dependable and reliable in respect to the pending project.

I continue the letter:

The section of the Louisiana-Texas Intracoastal Waterway extending from New Orleans to the Sabine River was estimated in 1924 to cost $9,552,000. It is being completed at a cost of $7,418,440.

In other words, in this major project these engineers upon whom we depend for our figures in defense of the pending treaty were $2,000,000 higher than the actual cost of the job when it came to be done. I submit that engineers with a record of that character are reliable witnesses, and are not to be controverted lightly by their colleagues in the Government of the United States.

I continue the letter:

I have also selected a list of 31 projects recently adopted by the Public Works Administration for which contracts for the entire completion of the project have already been entered into. The estimated cost of these projects made between 1930 and 1933 aggregated $16,973,600. Notwithstanding the provisions under which these works are being carried out with limited hours of labor, and with prescribed minimum wages to afford with the hours of labor as limited a standard of living in decency and comfort, and notwithstanding also the uncertainties of costs incident to the administration of the National Recovery Act; these works will be completed at a cost, including all costs of supervision and administration, of $18,355,368, or but 8 percent in excess of the estimates.

Here is the final paragraph in General Markham's letter; and it is particularly pertinent because we have been told, time and time again that the War Department engineers erred in respect to their figures on the Panama Canal. Indeed, this has been a favorite theme with those who strive to weaken the St. Lawrence case. I read:

Possibly the most outstanding example of the reliability of estimates prepared by the officers of this Department is that of the Panama Canal.

General Markham apparently is quite ready to meet his critics upon their own favorite ground.

I continue to read:

When the final designs for this canal with increased dimensions for locks and with the widening of the channel through the Culebra Cut were adopted in 1908, Colonel Goethals, in charge of the construction, had an estimate prepared of the cost of the canal. The amount of this estimate was—

Listen:

The amount of this estimate was $375,201,000.

There is a sizable project to be bracketed with the matter now pending in the Senate. Indeed, the adventure now seeking the Senate's approval is the greatest adventure since a former Roosevelt bisected Panama. Those who opposed the former would have opposed the latter on kindred grounds. But none would now wish that the Panama Canal had not been built.

What was the estimate of the engineers? $375,000,000. What did the Canal cost? I read continuingly from General Markham:

On June 30, 1918, after the Canal was opened and in permanent operation, the actual cost was $372,391,853.92.

In other words, the Panama Canal was built at a cost of about $3,000,000 less than the estimates of these engineers whom we summon as the experts upon whom we ask the country to rely in respect to the great St. Lawrence project.

So, Mr. President, I submit that upon these two scores the record is almost beyond controversion:

First, that the cost figures are reliable, and that the cost figures quoted in opposition to the War Department figures usually relate to a totally different type of project.

Second, that there is in fact no menace of the nature referred to by the able Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] in respect to a foreign and an alien jeopardy as a result of this further opening of the Great Lakes to the ocean; and, frankly, I wonder if my able friend from Illinois really thinks that the President of the United States and the State Department have been as duped in connection with these negotiations as his conclusions might indicate.

I have taken this immediate opportunity to complete the record so far as it has gone, because it is my profound conviction that this project, precisely as argued by the President of the United States in his own inimitable message, can meet its critics upon every ground and win the argument.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou who art eternally true, wise, and merciful, from our hearts may there break the prayer of gratitude and entreaty. We thank Thee that Thou art the source of courage, the replenishment of strength, and the inspiration of the common order. Be Thou the inbreak into the labor of this day and keep all burdened ones from the coils of weariness. Enable us to marshal ourselves to forms of everlasting usefulness for the sake of the Republic. God bless our native land and let the harmonies of free intelligence and concordant raptures of loyalty, fidelity, and patriotism be heard in all sections and everywhere. In the name of the Christ, our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

H.J.Res. 228. Joint resolution to provide for certain expenses incident to the second session of the Seventy-third Congress.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted a privileged report on the bill (H.R. 6951) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes (Report No. 288), which was read the first and second time and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LAMBERTSON reserved all points of order on the bill.

OLD-AGE PENSION

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address made by Hon. C. V. TRUAX, of Ohio, over the radio on Thursday, January 11, Washington, D.C., under the auspices of the National Old Age Pension Association.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. CHARLES V. TRUAX, of Ohio:

When we discuss this vital subject, we can only recall that the memory of man is but frail and weak at best. Only 15 years ago, a decade and a half, for me to be addressing you on the subject of old-age pensions would have seemed like a chapter from the Arabian Nights dreams. It is only by comparison that we can realize and understand the somewhat tragic, though truthful, circumstances that have transformed our economic and financial position during those 15 years from one of happiness and contentment to sorrow and disappointment.

Fifteen years ago, or the memorable year of 1919, marked the most prosperous era ever known to American wageworkers, to salaried workers, and to the tillers of the soil. In that year the light of happiness beamed in every eye. The song of prosperity issued from every throat. The throb of contentment beat in every heart. At last the children of a great Republic had been led out of the valleys of special privilege, selfishness, and greed, up to the mountain tops of justice and equality for all, and had gazed into the valleys of the promised land of peace and plenty.

Following the signing of the armistice, this pastoral picture of a united American people, a satisfied country, and the outstanding star in the firmament of nations, there came a rude and cruel awakening, a tragic awakening, such as must have confronted Rip Van Winkle when, after 20 years of peaceful slumber, he was roused to the actualities of a cold, practical world. I would, as with a magic wand, draw back the curtain of time even further. I would draw that curtain back to 1903. Thirty years ago there was little need for pensions of any sort. Men could earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, or make a living for themselves and their families from their professions and independent businesses. At that time in our Nation's progress, 65 percent of our people were rural, and only 35 percent urban. In the cities we heard the roar of the blast furnaces, the turning of the lathes, and a glance into the wageworker's home disclosed happy mothers with little children at their knees. The farmer, arising at the break of day, with the dew drop glistening on the grass at his feet, cheerfully toiled till twilight, secure in the knowledge that his efforts would be substantially rewarded.

But as in a great symphony which depicts four movements—the dawn, the calm, the storm, and the grand finale—this wonderful picture of peace and happiness for all was suddenly blackened by poverty and pauperization for all. The raid upon the common people by special privilege—the money trust, the Wall Street pirates and buccaneers, led by old John "Pirate" Morgan himself—started in 1921 when the Wall Street bankers, aided and abetted by the Federal Reserve Board, a private banking institution, deliberately and premeditately selected as the victims of their lust and plunder the American farmer and the American workingman. These scavengers on human misery and suffering started this raid by calling in the loans of the American tillers of the soil. They deflated labor by enforced idleness and drastic reductions in wages.

Since that time Congress by numerous acts, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and other public bodies, by their acts, and the courts by their decrees, have all enforced rules that operate against people that are forced to work for a living. Special privilege has been given greater and greater power, until now predatory wealth is firmly saddled and spurred on the backs of the common people.

In the year 1932, the most disastrous year, the most tragic year ever known to the American people, 3,142 individuals paid income taxes on incomes of more than $100,000 per year. The total net income of these 3,142 individuals was in excess of $700,000,000, proving conclusively that while the many battle desperately for life the few still pile up enormous fortunes by which the famed wealth of ancient Lydia's kings was but a beggar's patrimony. It is not always the pitiful poverty of the many, but the enormous wealth of the few, that is fostering discontent today. Nor is that all. While those who do toil are but fighting a losing battle, wearing out hand and heart and brain for a crust that becomes ever scantier, ever more bitter, there are hundreds of thousands and millions who cannot even obtain the poor privilege of tramping in this brutal industrial treadmill.

Chain systems ruined the independent business man. Crooked bankers robbed and plundered wageworkers of their all. The other exploiters of the masses—greedy public utilities, money lenders, the Shylocks, 36-percent loansharks—all exact a toll from farmers, wageworkers, and small business men, and producers that bleeds them white.

The old-age pension bill that the voters of Ohio adopted overwhelmingly last November provides that every idigent individual who reaches the age of 65 and has no visible means of support shall receive $25 per month. Not much, but enough to keep him from the poorhouse or from appealing to relatives or friends.

The millionaires are selfishly successful because they live by exploiting the rest of us. They fix the prices on what they buy from the people and on what they sell to the people. They rob the people by authority of law. The Chicago packers and grain racketeers fix the price of the wheat that the farmer sells and the beef and pork and lard that he produces. They process these elementals of human life itself, namely, food and the raw materials for clothing; then they set the price which the consumers shall pay—at a tremendous profit to themselves.

We witness the shocking spectacle of John "Pirate" Morgan, this modern Captain Kidd, archcrook and superburglar, towering above Bluebeard and Sir Francis Drake, as Saul towered above his brethren, refusing to pay income taxes to the Government that made it possible for him not to accumulate but to steal the controlling interest in $40,000,000,000 worth of the Nation's wealth.

The Nation is shocked by crime epidemics. We have almost reached a stage of anarchy as a result of the maladjustment of wealth and income. The common people must now take concerted action to save themselves from complete destruction and utter annihilation by the superwealthy gone wealthcrazy.

The money lender's voracious appetite is unappeased. Like a thief in the night, he stalks his prey, attacks him when he is unprepared, slips his strangling cord about his throat, and draws it taut. Every time the sun rises and sets, 3,000 mortgages are foreclosed against American wageworkers temporarily unemployed and American farmers pauperized and bankrupt. The word "mortgage"—that sinister word, taken from two French words, "mort", meaning death, "gage", the hand, literally the hand of death—slowly but surely is strangling the property owners of this great Nation of ours.

Oh, we have entreated with them, and they have answered, "Pay us the usurious interest you owe." We have petitioned them, and they reply, "Give us our pound of flesh." And in misery and desperation and woe we have fallen down at their knees and begged to save our homes and our farms, and they—like the financial wolves they are—have snarled, "Unless you pay us, like vampire bats we'll suck the very lifeblood from your veins by obtaining deficiency judgments, too." The immortal words of Shakespeare in his Merchant of Venice burn our hearts and sear our souls:

"You may as well go stand upon the beach
And bid the main flood bate his usual height;
You may as well use question with the wolf
Why he hath made the ewe bleat for the lamb;
* * * * *
You may as well do anything most hard,
As seek to soften that—than which what's harder?—
This damnable Shylock's heart."

The President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and the Seventy-third Congress have temporarily cauterized those gaping wounds, have temporarily stopped the flow of blood, by the enactment of the Farm Mortgage Act and the Home Loan Act of 1933, and will further stop that ebbing lifeblood by guaranteeing the principal of the $2,000,000,000 bond issue as well as the interest. But that is not enough. When the patient is bleeding to death, the first and most effective remedy is to apply the tourniquet, which can only be done by enacting a national moratorium against foreclosure.

Unfortunately, hundreds of thousands of our best citizens have been dispossessed of their all, 10,000,000 men still remain unemployed, dependent upon Government doles. This army of unfortunates form the parade of the living dead. Watch them as they go by—young men, men of middle age, white-haired patriarchs who have passed their three score and ten. With them are their wives and mothers. Marching on, marching on to the poorhouse, to relatives, or to suicide. Human derelicts cast up by the tidal waves of depression, money famines, and financial panics. Their bleaching bones litter the broadening highways and avenues of resumption of business and livable income for others.

Yet, even in normal times, we find that out of every hundred people who reach the age of 65, 84 are penniless, jobless, or dependent on relatives or charity for support. The vast concentration of wealth in the hands of the few is responsible. The super-industrialists, with their mammoth plants and conveyor system of production, cannot use men past 45 years of age, but callously kick them out, headed for the poorhouse or starvation. It is the crushing domination of property interests that causes men to starve in a land of plenty.

As to the details and mechanics of the bill proposed by the National Old Age Pension Association, I believe with them that indigent individuals of 55 years should be provided with pensions. After the individual has passed the age of 65, that age and his American citizenship should be the only requirement. I offer a suggestion in the manner and mode of financing. Let those who have profited most from the industry and toil of these distressed people, the international brigands, the big bankers, giant corporations, chain systems, and other malefactors of swollen wealth, pay the bill.

The pyramiding of ill-gotten wealth continued until agriculture and labor could no longer work long enough nor hard enough to meet the demands of their blackmailers and live. Even after the reemployment of 5,000,000 workers under the Roosevelt recovery program, 10,000,000 still are unemployed. Hundreds of thousands of farmers have lost their farms. Hundreds of thousands of small business men and producers are hanging on by the skin of their teeth. These, my friends, are the reasons for old-age pensions.

Grant pensions and you will do more to restore confidence and quell revolt than all recovery measures combined. Deny these distressed people this meager pittance, and you may witness what Edwin Markham, the famous American poet, visualized when he penned the last verse of The Man with the Hoe—

"O masters, lords, and rulers in all lands,
How will the Future reckon with this Man?
How answer his brute question in that hour
When whirlwinds of rebellion shake the world?
How will it be with kingdoms and with kings—
With those who shaped him to the thing he is—
When this dumb Terror shall reply to God,
After the silence of the centuries?"

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I announced, after a colloquy with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], that I would put in the RECORD a statement showing the amount of Federal money that has gone into the development of harbors and waterways in his State, and other States of the Atlantic seaboard, as compared with the appropriations that have been made for the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway, which constitutes the only means of direct contact with the commerce of the world available to the people of the interior.

The Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army for 1932 shows that up to June 30 of that year the Federal Government had expended $627,143,618.84 on seacoast harbors and channels and only $201,852,107.03 on the harbors and channels of the Great Lakes. The huge sum of $70,482,719 had been spent in the gentleman's city of New York and its environs, $19,277,412.22 on the Hudson River, $67,558,147.49 in the Philadelphia district, $13,489,955.55 at Boston, $14,812,062.72 at Baltimore, and $10,466,667.21 at Norfolk. The city of New Orleans, whose spokesmen have been conspicuous opponents of the St. Lawrence treaty, has been the beneficiary of Federal bounty to the extent of $51,309,296.50.

The report for 1930 shows that whereas the Great Lakes carry 91.83 percent of the traffic borne by the inland waterways of the United States, in ton-miles the harbors and channels of the Great Lakes had up to June 30, 1930, received only 11.1 percent of the Federal funds provided for inland-waterway development.

The gentleman from New York says that his State, paying 30 percent of Federal taxes, would bear 30 percent of the cost of the St. Lawrence development. I would say that if his State, with 10 percent of the population of the country, has 30 percent of its income—that fact alone furnishes the best reason for extending to other parts of the Nation some of the advantages that have made New York so prosperous. Being the gateway of the country and levying a toll upon its business, it was inevitable that New York should become very rich. What we in the Middle West propose is that the advantage of access to the oceans, the advantage of lower transportation costs, shall be distributed so that all may share in the prosperity which comes from international and intracoastal trade.

I want to challenge the implication from the gentleman's remarks that 30 percent of the contribution of this Government to the cost of constructing the seaway would come from the people of his State. What we should remember is that, after all, the city of New York is a funnel through which much of the Nation's income flows. Many corporations doing business in the Middle West have New York offices, gather their earnings into New York, pay their dividends out of New York, keep books in New York, make income-tax returns from New York. The great iron-ore industry of northern Minnesota, which normally yields two thirds of the Nation's output, which uses the Great Lakes for the transportation of its product, does not make its income-tax returns from Minnesota. Undoubtedly much of the income from that great industry is reported from offices in the gentleman's State and pays taxes from that State.

The gentleman, inadvertently no doubt, falls into an error which opponents of the St. Lawrence project have so often made in the past. He denies that the seaway would give the people of the interior cheaper transportation, and in the same breath charges that it would divert traffic from eastern seaports and "destroy the trade of the port of New York." He might consistently argue—either that the seaway would hurt the ports of his State by shifting tonnage to a cheaper route, or that the seaway would not change the competitive position of eastern seaports because it would not give the people of the interior lower transportation costs; but we shall insist that he choose one horn of the dilemma or the other. When a man tries to sit on both sides of a barbed-wire fence at the same time, his position is bound to be uncomfortable.

The gentleman objects to spending money to build a waterway "in a foreign country." We did not hear much objection when the United States made a much greater expenditure some decades ago to construct the Panama Canal, which was also built in a foreign country. That project, which aggravated the competitive disadvantage of the Middle West but gave New York easy access to the ports on the Pacific, did not bring from the gentleman's constituents any such lamentations as we now hear. It was eminently proper to spend American money "in a foreign country" to help New York; it is shockingly wrong to do it to help Minnesota and the other States of the interior.

But the fact is that we, the American people, will help pay for a seaway through Canada whether the present treaty is ratified or not. The only difference is that we shall pay tolls forever rather than a lump sum now. Already power interests in the gentleman's own State are proposing to develop the St. Lawrence River for power, granting to the Canadian Government full navigation rights as the price for the concession. These interests would rather own the water power of the St. Lawrence than have the two Governments own it. They are not in sympathy with President Roosevelt's program of developing water-power sites to be owned and controlled by the people. And they have no concern for the fate of the people of the land-locked interior who would be doomed to pay, and pay forever, for what should be a natural heritage—the right and opportunity to use the seas.

It has been charged that the St. Lawrence seaway is "a political football." The people of the Middle West have not so used it. If the charge of injecting politics into this issue has any foundation, it must be made against the spokesmen for eastern seaports, who have joined hands with Chicago and New Orleans to defeat the present treaty. There have been evidences of cooperation between New York and Chicago and between New York and New Orleans which can hardly be explained except upon the assumption that they have mutually agreed, "You scratch my back and I'll scratch yours." There has been fresh proof of the old adage that politics makes strange bedfellows.

The only politics in the present effort of the political leaders of the Middle West to secure ratification of the St. Lawrence treaty is the politics which prompts representatives of the people to attempt to obtain for the people what they need and want. If that is the sense in which the gentleman uses the word "politics", then I say that it would be well if we had in the United States more politics of that kind. The people of the Middle West want access to the seas, and their representatives will fight for it until the last barrier has been removed.

REFINANCING OF FARM DEBTS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 6670, to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the financing of farm debts, and for other purposes; and pending that, I should like to see if we can agree on time for general debate. I suggest 3 hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] and one half to be controlled by myself.

Mr. HOPE. I think that will be agreeable to this side.

Mr. JONES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that time for general debate be limited to not exceed 3 hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas and one half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 6670; and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that there be 3 hours of general debate, one half to be controlled by himself and one half by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE]. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman means that debate shall be confined to the bill?

Mr. JONES. I did not include that in the request.

Mr. SNELL. I just want to know.

Mr. JONES. I should prefer to have it that way.

The SPEAKER. The debate to be confined to the bill. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6670) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the financing of farm debts and for other purposes, with Mr. GREENWOOD in the chair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the principal part of the pending bill has to do with land-bank bonds. The bill is confined largely to provisions for the refinancing of farm mortgages as a part of the farm-credit administration.

Briefly, the present set-up of the Farm Credit Administration began operations on May 1. In the 8 months following the land banks have actually closed and paid out more than $250,000,000 in the refinancing of farm mortgages. They have approved some $600,000,000 additional.

They have either paid out or approved about $945,000,000 in connection with the refinancing of farm mortgages. They have applications pending involving some $2,100,000,000 which if approved would take more than is provided in the entire act. Of course, these applications will not all be approved. They are making loans at the present time of some five or six million dollars per day, or at the rate of more than $1,000,000,000 per year.

This, it seems to me, is a remarkable showing for a new organization. They have actually put out nearly 10 times as much in the first 8 months as was put out in the year previous to the Mortgage Refinancing Act of 1933.

At the time of the passage of the 1933 act the land banks had some 212 appraisers. They now have more than 5,000. I think some of the best work done by any of the emergency organizations has been done by the Farm Credit Administration. Its work has saved hundreds of thousands of American farms and homes. Of course, it would be desirable to continue under the bill as heretofore drafted, but, as you know, the Government has a good deal of financing to do within the next few months.

Under the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act $200,000,000 in cash was made available and $2,000,000,000 in Government interest-guaranteed bonds, the principal not being guaranteed. After investigation it was found that it would not be wise to undertake to market these bonds.

The money that has been paid out between May 1 and January 1 amounts to about $210,000,000. This has now been increased to $251,000,000. About $70,000,000 of the $200,000,000, I believe, is in Commissioners' loans. One hundred and forty million dollars was in land-bank loans.

Mr. PIERCE. One hundred and forty million dollars?

Mr. JONES. And about $150,000,000 which has been advanced by the R.F.C. on the security of interest-guaranteed bonds.

However, it is thought they will not be able to continue furnishing the essential funds for the refinancing in cash. So, in order to make funds available, it has been recommended, as you heard in the message, that the Government guarantee the principal as well as the interest of the $2,000,000,000 in bonds.

I think this is a wise procedure, for the reason that with the Government putting up $200,000,000 in cash, as in the original bill, and guaranteeing the interest for a number of years, the Government is practically guaranteeing the principal, because, having done that, they could not afford to let the principal lapse; so we would just as well guarantee the principal and get the full beneficial effects of the refinancing. So I do not see how any one can seriously object to the method devised for handling this situation in the light of the action heretofore taken.

I wish to go over briefly the terms of the bill. I shall file in the RECORD a full explanation of the action heretofore taken and the work done by the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I wonder if the gentleman would mind yielding at this point?

Mr. JONES. I would prefer to finish my explanation, if I may, and then I shall be pleased to yield.

Of course, the handling of finances is not a simple matter, especially when money is handled on such an extensive scale, and I think those who have been administering the Farm Credit Administration are to be congratulated upon the success which they have made.

I am peculiarly interested in the Farm Credit Administration. It has not only the land-bank features, but it has three other important features, and this is the first time in the history of the world—I do not mean of this country—that a complete credit structure has been formulated for agriculture, separate and apart from the commercial banking structure of the country. It is so formulated that if it is kept on a sound basis the farmers themselves will ultimately own it.

In my boyhood days I walked over the hills and valleys and plains of north Texas under the shadow of 15- and 20-percent interest; interest figured at 10 percent, compounded every 60 days, with bonuses sometimes added up in such a way as only a good banker could figure them. This kept the farmer forever in debt. It was impossible under that old system for the farmer to ever get out of debt. I am not offering this in criticism of the bankers. They have a legitimate function to perform and a useful function, but the entire banking structure is formulated on a liquid basis, on a short-term basis, and if the banker does not keep his bank on that basis the inspector gets after him. So his credit could not be suited to the needs of agriculture.

It was the intention to formulate a credit system peculiarly suited to agriculture and it is my hope that it will be kept on a sound basis and that the farmer, through this lower interest rate and better form of credit, may finally get out of debt; at least, subject only to his current needs, and thus at least be free, and this is the only way he can ever be free. A long time ago the old prophet said, "The borrower is servant to the lender"; and that is gospel as well as the law of life.

I want now to make a brief explanation of the provisions of this particular bill.

The first paragraph provides for a farm credit corporation, which is to issue exactly the same number and amount of bonds that were issued under the old act, and these are to have the principal, as well as interest, guaranteed. They are then given the privilege of exchanging these for the consolidated land-bank bonds. This is in order to keep the institution as organized in this way a formal one and to keep the bonds separate from the original land-bank bonds.

Section 2 provides that the corporation shall have succession until dissolved by an act of Congress, and will exercise all of the general and incidental powers of an ordinary corporation. The corporation will also be entitled to the free use of the mails, and, with the consent of any board or commission or other department of the Government, may avail itself of the use of their facilities.

Section 3 provides that the capital of the corporation will be in the sum of $200,000,000, all of which will be subscribed and owned by the United States Government. The stock will be paid for out of funds made available to the Land Bank Commissioner under the provisions of section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933. You will recall that that act provides for Farm Commissioner loans in the sum of $200,000,000, and that funds and the mortgages issued thereunder are used as a basis for the capital stock of the new corporation.

Mr. BOLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I would prefer to finish the explanation and then I will be pleased to yield.

Section 4 provides that in order to enable the Federal land banks and the Land Bank Commissioner to obtain the necessary funds for the continuation of their lending operations, the corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an aggregate amount outstanding at any one time not to exceed $2,000,000,000. These bonds will be fully and unconditionally guaranteed as to interest and principal by the United States, and shall, on account of such guaranty, be lawful investments and may be accepted as security for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds.

The Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation is given power to issue its bonds in such amounts and at such times as may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury. The bonds will be secured by the consolidated bonds issued by the Federal land banks, by mortgages on farm lands made by the Land Bank Commissioner, and by such other collateral as the corporation may have available.

The corporation may exchange its bonds under the terms of this act for consolidated farm-loan bonds issued by the Federal land banks, and may also make loans to Federal land banks on the security of consolidated farm-loan bonds.

The corporation will be authorized under the terms of the act to purchase the consolidated bonds of the Federal land banks.

Section 5 gives a limited time under which the old consolidated bonds may be issued. After the expiration of 90 days they will not be permitted to be issued.

Sections 6 and 7 together provide that loans may be made by the Federal land banks, and by the Land Bank Commissioner may be made in bonds of the corporation.

Under section 8 the Federal land banks will be authorized to exchange their bonds for bonds of the corporation and to purchase bonds of the corporation.

Section 9 makes changes in the handling of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933. It has been found that the Commissioner's loans have been valuable in this emergency in enabling the Farm Credit Administration to refinance many mortgages that were in distress and could not have otherwise been refinanced. There has already been approved more than enough in the Commissioner's loans to take up the entire $200,000,000. This increases the sum provided for such loans by $600,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Does this contemplate that loans shall be made as they are now made by the banks, or will there be a separate method?

Mr. JONES. Under the old act they had 2 appraisers and 2 complete sets of expenses, and how they will all be covered by 1 application.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This gives an additional amount and makes it available without increasing the total fund?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Sections 10, 11, and 12 authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to use the corporation as a fiscal agent of the United States and provide that the corporation and its income shall be exempt from taxes except real property taxes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. On page 10 of the bill it provides that not only shall the bonds of the Corporation be held to be exempt from Federal, State, and municipal and local taxation, but also the income derived therefrom. I cannot see why the income derived therefrom should be exempt. I do not remember that that was in the last bill. The Supreme Court in the California case decided——

Mr. JONES. I do not yield for a discussion. The gentleman can discuss that in his own time. That was the language used in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. There is no substantial change. I do not believe in the system of issuing tax-exempt securities. I think ultimately the Congress and the country will find it wise to change that system and not issue any more, but undoubtedly, if you do issue them for loans to industry, it would be unfair to make the farmer pay the higher rate of interest which a bond without the same tax privilege would have to bear, for refinancing farm mortgages. So long as the system continues, I am in favor of putting farmers on a parity here, as well as in the price of their products.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. In the original Farm Loan Act there was a limitation on the interest that might be paid on these bonds, and also a limitation upon the interest that might be charged the farmer. Is there any further provision as to such limitation in this bill?

Mr. JONES. The same limitations remain in the act. This simply makes the funds available. Of course, all these funds go into the farm-credit funds, and the farmer gets the benefit of the lowest rate of interest at which they may be able to sell the bonds, when it comes time to put them on the market.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does not the gentleman believe, in view of the fact that the Government guarantees now the principal as well as the interest, that the farmer should derive advantage from that in a lower rate of interest?

Mr. JONES. He will do that if they find they are able to market the bonds in such a way as to make it possible. The whole set-up is so formulated that that is to be made the policy, and that is the policy of the present administration.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman believe that by placing in the law a maximum interest rate that that operates as a minimum, and that by reducing the maximum that might be charged would operate also to reduce the rate at which the bonds could be purchased?

Mr. JONES. In these particular bonds the interest rate is not fixed. They will fix it at only such point as will enable them to get par or approximately par for the bonds. It may be made lower.

Mr. THURSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. In view of the fact that the interest charged on home loans is 4 percent and on farm loans 4½ percent, should there not be a requirement that the interest paid on farm loans should not exceed that on home loans?

Mr. JONES. As I understand it, the interest on home loans is one half of 1 percent higher. The point remains that whatever profits are made in this system will go back to the farmer in the form of reduced interest rates if they are able to justify that kind of a program.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is not it a fact that this bill makes no change in the interest rates to be charged the farmer?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. BLANCHARD. He will be charged exactly what he was under the old regime?

Mr. JONES. Yes; the old rate provided that it should not exceed a certain amount. They still have the privilege of reducing, but not increasing the rate.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BOLAND. Has the gentleman any knowledge as to when the companion bill guaranteeing home-loan bonds will be presented for consideration, and whether it will be along the same lines as this?

Mr. JONES. I regret that I am not able to answer that. That bill will be handled by another committee, and I suggest that the gentleman get in touch with some member of the Banking and Currency Committee. I understand it will be along the same lines, but I would not undertake to give information on that.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I should like to know why the Governor should be permitted to appoint two members of the board of directors. Why should not that be done by the President?

Mr. JONES. This is a set-up of officers already down there, and it simply provides for the members of the staff to become directors of this organization, more or less for convenience. I do not think it makes much difference who the officers are, so long as they are the same officers who are in charge of the administration of the law.

Mr. KELLER. May I not suggest that the man who is the Governor, if he appoints his own directors, might as well not have them at all?

Mr. JONES. As a matter of fact, it is required, usually, that there must be some directors; and this, as the gentleman knows, is more or less an organization to keep the funds separate. It is to be handled by the same people.

Mr. KELLER. I do not like the idea of the president of a board of directors appointing his own directors.

Mr. JONES. If this were a corporation going out to do a separate business, that criticism would be well laid; but I do not think it is here; and, besides, the Secretary of the Treasury is made a member, and everything that affects the Treasury must be approved by the Secretary. I do not think there will be any danger.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman would say that the security to an investor in these new bonds is as good or better than the present Government issues, would he not?

Mr. JONES. I would not want to make a comparison of that kind. I think the investor will have a good investment in these bonds. I would not want to say that one form of bond is better than another, because I am not an expert on investments. The gentleman has had a good deal more experience than I in that line.

Mr. McFADDEN. Looking at it from the investor's standpoint, he has as security not only the guaranty of principal by the Government, but of interest, and, in addition, he has a lien against real estate not to exceed 50 percent of its value.

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. McFADDEN. Therefore, it is a superior security to the present issue of Government bonds.

Mr. JONES. I am glad for the gentleman's opinion on that, because I value it highly. I do think they will be a good investment, and therefore, they will be able to get reasonably low rates of interest on them.

Mr. McFADDEN. What I want the gentleman to answer is another question. If these bonds sell in the market at 3½ percent, what rate of interest would the farmer-borrower pay?

Mr. JONES. That would depend a great deal upon whether they all sold at that figure. They will not all be issued at once. They will be issued as needed, as provided by the bill. I would say if they sold for 3½ they would probably be able to charge not more than 4½, but I would rather leave that to administrative authority, because the expense of operation may vary a little as times and salaries change. I think it has been found in the long run that it is not costing the Government more than about 1 percent for overhead to operate these administrative bodies.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say that the additional cost to the borrower is left to administrative authority?

Mr. JONES. No, no.

Mr. McFADDEN. I was under the impression it was fixed in the bill.

Mr. JONES. There is no need getting into an argument on that. There are limitations in the bill as to salaries. The gentleman from Pennsylvania for a long time was a member of the committee which handled these loan banks, and I am giving the gentleman information which he already possesses, and basing it on the experience of those who handle these matters and matters under the jurisdiction of the gentleman's committee. I take it that the handling of a mattetr of this kind will not be any more expensive; at least I am hoping it can be made less than that.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the provisions of this bill, you are going to set up an entirely new corporation?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. What becomes of the Corporation that we set up last spring? We authorized $200,000,000 for capital for that organization. I see there is $200,000,000 authorized for the capital of this organization. How are you going to combine the two? Certainly you are not going to have two organizations doing exactly the same work?

Mr. JONES. They will not be doing exactly the same work. All this corporation will do will be to issue the guaranteed bonds, and thus keep them separate from the previous issues or any other kind of issue that may hereafter be issued by the bank, and thus have the matter separate. It is purely a matter of handling. There is not going to be any new stock. They use the money provided for the Commissioners' loans for the capital stock.

Mr. SNELL. The money that we provided last year is to be used for the capital stock of this corporation?

Mr. JONES. It is money that was provided for the commissioners' loans. Of course, all these funds are used in administering the act and making the law.

Mr. SNELL. But you will not have two organizations doing the same work?

Mr. JONES. No, no.

Mr. SNELL. When this is all completed there will only be one organization doing this work?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. This superorganization you are setting up now will not make the actual loans?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. The actual loans will be made by the old organizations?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. They just furnish the money to the old organizations to loan to the farmers?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; or make it possible for them to get the money by an exchange of bonds.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Is this $2,000,000,000 that is going to be issued for this purpose a part of the program of the President in his expenditure of $10,000,000,000 for the next 2 years, or is this additional?

Mr. JONES. That is part of the program. The gentleman puts some other matters in his questions that I do not undertake to pass upon. It is a part of the program that was embodied in the President's message which came here about 2 days ago.

Mr. RICH. But my question was whether this was entirely separate from that proposal?

Mr. JONES. This, I understand, is embodied in the Budget message. I have not gone through it, but I understand it is.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield further, for a matter of clarification?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Do I understand that this corporation, which will have $200,000,000 capital and authority to borrow up to $2,000,000,000, will have authority to take over in exchange for these new securities the present outstanding Federal farm-loan bonds?

Mr. JONES. No, sir; they are limited to the consolidated bonds which have been issued and which are now in the hands of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and which will be issued hereafter.

Mr. McFADDEN. Those that were issued last spring?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. And no further extension is necessary?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman may have stated this in the first part of his remarks, but I did not hear it. Will the gentleman state the amount of the consolidated bonds which are now outstanding?

Mr. JONES. There are about $150,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. About $150,000,000 out of a total authorized of $2,000,000,000?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Could the gentleman state what the market price of those bonds is today?

Mr. JONES. None of them has ever been offered on the market. They consulted with certain sources and decided it would not be wise to offer them on the market at the particular time, in view of the other refinancing that was being done, and they have never been offered since on the market.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They were quoted on a basis of "if and when issued", were they not?

Mr. JONES. I am not informed. I never heard of their being quoted, because they were never made available.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am wondering if I am talking about the same bonds which the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman may have in mind the home owners' bonds.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. The bonds authorized under the agricultural relief bill passed at the last session of the Congress.

Mr. JONES. I do not know of any, although there may have been some. I did not undertake to keep up with those things; but I have the assurance of the authorities that they have never issued any of these bonds on the market, and that the only ones outstanding are those which have been placed with the R.F.C.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have known of instances where farm mortgages have been readjusted on the basis of the bonds I am trying to talk about.

Mr. JONES. There is always a good deal of trading back and forth in readjustments. I may say that in these Commissioner's loans they suggest reductions in about one fifth of the cases; and in the cases where they are refinanced they took as high as a 23-percent reduction. This in many instances enabled the farmer to see daylight and save his farm.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not criticizing the result.

Mr. JONES. I do not know as to what figure they placed on the bonds, but there have been no bonds available. They were simply speculating, as men sometimes do on the exchanges, on what may be the future value of the bonds when they do go on the market; but I can assure the gentleman there were never any of them on the market.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wish it were certain that the gentleman from Texas and I are talking about the same bonds.

Mr. JONES. There is a considerable number of outstanding bonds of the old land banks. Was the gentleman thinking of them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. The quotations came to country banks within my knowledge and were at 83 percent. The settlement was made on that basis.

Mr. JONES. Of course I have only the assurance of the officials of the Farm Credit Administration that the bonds have not been offered; that they consulted about the matter but did not offer any of the bonds. If their information to me is correct, then my information to the gentleman from New York is correct.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If the Federal Government is going to guarantee both principal and interest on these bonds and the bonds, in addition, have back of them a first mortgage on this real estate, they are going to be one of the best bonds in America.

Mr. JONES. I certainly hope so; and I think that is thoroughly justified. I think the thing, perhaps more than any other one thing, which at the present time is restoring this country is the fact we have practically stopped the foreclosure of farm mortgages in all cases where there is any reasonable chance of saving the home. I believe the Government's policy is thoroughly justified.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield for a further question that I may complete my inquiry?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If these bonds are to be so adequately secured and so readily marketable, why exempt them from Federal income tax? I think we are issuing too many tax-exempt bonds. I think we should eliminate the tax-exempt feature in these bonds.

Mr. JONES. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman, but I go back to the proposition that so long as I serve as chairman of this committee I am going to try to see that the farmer stands on precisely the same level of equality as industry. [Applause.]

I cannot yield further time.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to add this one comment: I would like to see the farmer get the benefit of some of the Federal funds if possible. We ought not give the moneyed people of this country all the advantage, especially in bonds of this character.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss the proposed legislation in H.R. 6670, the bill here under consideration, further than to state that it has for its object and purpose the creation of another Federal corporation to be known as the Federal Farm Corporation. It will add another chapter to the already superabundance of make-believe farm legislation. Much will be claimed for this bill, the same as was claimed last spring for the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933. The main object and purpose, however, is for the United States Government to guarantee payment to the coupon clippers not only of the tax-exempt interest coupons but of the tax-exempt principal as well of the Federal land-bank bonds and the bonds to be issued by the Federal farm corporation.

It will also make room for the appointment in key positions of several more Republicans, financial manipulators such as Jaffrey, Barton, Smith, and others from the Twin Cities, and for additional busted Republican bankers and brokers with here and there a lonely Democrat for dress parade, with a sprinkling of overeducated scholastic economists used for window dressing—a combination that is now largely in control of the make-believe farm-relief program, and that is why it has made such a miserable showing. I have no objection to the appointment of Republicans nor of Democrats, nor yet of honest busted bankers, because I know that the small bankers were wrecked by the international gamblers in stocks and bonds and the Wall Street racketeers. But I do feel that in this farm-relief program the men appointed should know something about the farm problem. Agricultural crops are not raised in a bank, nor in a closed bank, nor even in a schoolroom. Therefore the farm problem will never be settled until it is settled right—until it is settled by those who know something about farming and the farm problems, and it will never be settled by bankers, brokers, professors, or economists. [Applause.]

Under the provisions of this bill $2,200,000,000 of the credit of the United States is placed completely and absolutely under the control, without any limitation whatsoever, of the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration and the Secretary of the Treasury, both of whom I regard very highly personally, but both of whom come from New York, and while that is no crime, I say unhesitatingly that they do not understand the agricultural problems of this Nation. They are mere babes in the woods when it comes to the farmer and his problems. The farmers have no confidence in such a set-up, and confidence must precede success. The farmers of this Nation do not believe that anyone reared and trained in the shadow of the temples of the money changers is either sympathetic or knows or understands their problems, or can serve the best interests of agriculture.

We are all part of our environment, and in the various legislation proposed by these gentlemen, they have shown that they are part of their environment because they have never lost sight of the coupon clippers, of the tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds. They do not understand the fundamentals of agriculture nor its problems. They have more confidence in bankers, brokers, coupon clippers, and tax-exempt, interest-bearing bonds than they have in the hand that feeds them, as is shown by the proposed bill now under consideration which I am reliably informed was drafted by these two gentlemen from New York who are now to be given full and complete charge of the $2,200,000,000 of the Nation's credit.

If we really want to do something for the farmers, why not make John A. Simpson, National President of the Farmers' Union, president of this "Federal Farm Corporation", and C. C. Talbott, F. H. Taber, William Settle, and Cal Ward, or other prominent farm leaders, directors. Give to these farm leaders, who know the farm problem, the control of the $2,200,000,000 credit proposed in this bill and you will get real and not make-believe results. [Applause.] Have we not as much confidence in these men's honor, integrity, ability, and leadership as we have in the gentlemen from New York—do they not know more about farming and the farm problems? Or have we become so class conscious that we do not believe that anyone except a New Yorker knows anything about finances? If that is the case, then let me remind you that the international bankers and the Wall Street gamblers and brokers all but wrecked this Nation—surely New York has no monopoly on financial intelligence.

We are told that the object of this bill is to lower the interest rate to farmers. Oh, yes; we were also told that the Agricultural Adjustment Act and the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 would do that and more, but these two acts have not been much of a success in spite of the information to the contrary that is being given to the public by Government officials over the radio and otherwise.

Under the silly provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, the Secretary of Agriculture has felt impelled to have his picture taken with a mule in the wanton destruction of property—in the destruction of cotton, when millions are in rags and in want of clothing—when the Salvation Army and the Boy Scouts are now busy throughout this Nation collecting old clothes and rags for needy men, women, and children. In this case, my gratitude goes out to the mule who refused to become a party to this vandalism, and I am very much afraid that future history will place the intelligence and humanity of the mule above that of the Department of Agriculture.

Under this same legislation the Secretary of Agriculture has felt impelled to have the throats cut of millions of little pigs and bury them in the pig cemetery in the outskirts of Chicago while at least 500,000 hungry men, women, and children in that city would have welcomed a roast of pork for their Sunday dinner. [Applause.]

Under this same legislation, the Secretary of Agriculture felt impelled to assume the role of Mrs. Sanger and teach lady piggies birth control, but I am afraid that the Secretary is not succeeding as well as Mrs. Sanger, because I hold here in my hand a picture of a mother pig who gave birth to 22 little piggies, in spite of the Secretary's efforts to reduce the pig population. This picture was sent to me by my good Democratic friend, James A. Bell, of Elkhart, Ind., with the following notation: "When Secretary Wallace gets through with the milk strike in Chicago, he will stop this business."

This policy I cannot sanction. To me it seems to be national lunacy, or just plain craziness. The greatness of this Nation is due to the fact that in the past we have produced an abundance of everything we needed. The reverse now seems to be the order of the day. Now, in order that the poor may have more to eat, we plow down crops and destroy food products. Such a policy seems to me to be contrary to the laws of nature.

We have done little to assist the 30,000,000 farm population. We have billions for the coupon clippers—the buyers of tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds but very little for the farmers and the veterans. In the bill here under discussion we are to appropriate $200,000,000 and guarantee the interest and principal of a $2,000,000,000 bond issue. Why not substitute the Frazier-Lemke bill? All that we ask under the Frazier-Lemke bill is that we be given this $2,200,000,000 and that the Government issue Federal reserve notes to that extent. That would be a thousand times better than guaranteeing the interest and principal. Under the Frazier-Lemke bill the Government will receive interest and get the principal back. Under the bill here under consideration the Government guarantees the interest and principal, and the bankrupt farmer is supposed to pay it. In this bill we have the cart before the horse—we are going back end forward. Why not do the reasonable thing, the intelligent thing, the only thing, and pass the Frazier-Lemke bill. Eighty-five percent of the farmers and 20 State legislatures have asked you to pass the Frazier-Lemke bill. Why turn a deaf ear to them?

The Frazier-Lemke bill provides that the United States Government shall refinance existing farm indebtedness at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal on the amortization plan, not by issuing bonds but by issuing Federal Reserve notes secured by the best securities on earth, first mortgages on farm lands; better security than gold or silver, because you cannot eat gold or silver but you can eat the products that grow on the farms, therefore your life depends upon the farms. They are the best security on the face of the earth. If our Government has enough intelligence to do this, it will make a profit of $6,345,000,000 at 1½-percent interest in 47 years, the time required for amortization of the farm indebtedness.

When the Frazier-Lemke bill becomes a law then there will be issued and put into circulation, among the people, several billion of dollars of new money—Federal Reserve notes. It will again give purchasing power to the people—the farmer will pay his banker, his merchant, his lawyer, and his doctor, and they in turn will pay their bills, and all will start in again repairing and improving their homes—unemployment and starvation will cease—the enforced idleness of 12,000,000 men and women, part of whom are now receiving a disguised dole, will disappear and we will hear no more of overproduction—consumption will again be normal—real prosperity—the kind we had in 1919—will again return.

Let us now compare the Frazier-Lemke bill with the one passed by the special session of Congress, written in New York by an overscholastic college professor who was brought up in the atmosphere of money changers. Under this bill, if all the farm indebtedness is refinanced, the farmers of this Nation will pay $12,492,500,000 in 39 years to the coupon clippers. The difference that the farmers will have to pay in interest between the Frazier-Lemke bill in 47 years and under this bill in 39 years is $6,149,500,000. Under the Frazier-Lemke bill the Government will make a profit of $6,345,000,000, and to that extent lessen our taxes which we will have to pay, while under this bill the coupon clippers will make a profit of $12,492,500,000.

Under the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, the bankrupt farmer is asked to pay 4½-percent interest if he lives in a Federal Land Bank district and 5 percent if he does not, and in addition he is asked to pay 1 percent for administration and buy stock in an amount equal to 5 percent of the loan, making 10½ or 11 percent the first year, and thereafter 4½- or 5-percent interest. While under the Frazier-Lemke bill he will pay 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal, or $30 for each thousand dollars loaned for approximately 47 years.

Therefore, under the Frazier-Lemke bill a farmer could carry a $17,000 mortgage loan—as far as his ability to pay goes—as easily as a $5,000 loan under the present law. That is why under the Frazier-Lemke bill, it is perfectly safe to refinance a farmer up to the full reasonable value of the land and 50 percent of the insured permanent improvements, because that bill takes into consideration the farmer's ability to pay. Under the Frazier-Lemke bill the Government will make several billions profit, and under the act here proposed, the Government will lose millions and the taxpayers will have to foot the bill.

Again, under the Frazier-Lemke bill, the borrowing farmers will have something to say about the administration, while under all of the so-called "farm-relief measures" passed during the special session and now proposed, he has nothing to say. He is treated as if he were an incompetent, a ward—and in need of a guardian.

Let me say to you, gentlemen, the farmer is getting tired of that kind of treatment.

The average farmer knows more about money and credit, its objects and functions, more about finance and agriculture and the business of the country, than the average economist or banker, who are now placed in all key positions to lord it over him. Contracts have been prepared by these gentlemen with limited experience and knowledge for the farmers to sign that are an insult to his intelligence. These contracts not only enslave the farmer but also his family. They are cruel, brutal, and inhuman. I have reference to the hog-and-corn contracts, the allotment contracts, and the barnyard-loan mortgages. I ask the Members to read the barnyard-loan mortgage which the farmer is asked to sign. Until I had read these contracts I had at least expected the Government to be reasonably honest and clean in its dealings with its own citizens, but I have been forced against my will to come to a different conclusion.

We should know the truth, even though the truth destroy us. We are told that farm conditions are improving. Here is the way they are improving. On Friday, December 22, 1933, the following were the prices paid for farm products at Yankton, S.Dak.: Hens, 4 pounds and up, 7 cents per pound; under 4 pounds, 5 cents; springs, 5 pounds and up, 8 cents; 4 to 5 pounds, 6 cents; Leghorn hens, 4 cents; Leghorn springs, 4 cents; ducks, 5 cents; geese, 4 cents; eggs, 15 cents; butterfat, 11 cents; while hogs from nothing up to $2.75, and cattle from nothing to $3.75 per hundred. Just think of buying a large, nice 5-pound duck for 25 cents—a nice, fat goose weighing 12 pounds for 48 cents, and the same is true of the other commodities I have named. With these figures in mind, listen to the misinformation given you over the radio by Government officials about the prosperity of the farmers, and judge for yourselves as to its accuracy. Pass the Frazier-Lemke bill and, in addition, give the farmers the cost of production, and these conditions will right themselves and we will have national prosperity.

While the farmers were receiving the lowest prices in the history of this Nation for their products, the wholesalers had increased the prices of the things the farmers use. They had increased the price on standard brand 8-ounce overall jackets and on standard brand 8-ounce overalls from $12 to $18 a dozen, on no. 220 denim overall jackets and no. 220 denim overalls from $7.75 to $13.75 a dozen, and on standard cambray work shirts from $3.25 to $5.75 a dozen. Is there any wonder that the farmers declare the Blue Eagle the symbol of slavery and refuse to trade with merchants that display this bird of ill-omen—this hideous misshapen and misconceived buzzard with 7 feathers in 1 wing and 10 in the other—this bird of prey?

In conclusion, permit me to suggest that the Frazier-Lemke bill is right in line with the President's monetary policy. The mere seizing of the gold by the Government and increasing its value by lowering the gold content in the dollar may make several billions profit for the Government, but it will not help agriculture or industry unless the units of the medium of exchange is also increased. Lowering the gold content in a dollar, making gold dearer, will bring about further deflation unless it is followed by a corresponding increase of the medium of exchange in the hands of the people. Give us $2,200,000,000 Federal Reserve notes under the Frazier-Lemke bill and the farmers will be satisfied and the buying power of the Nation will be increased and it will be in accordance with the President's monetary policy. I, for one, feel happy and enthusiastic over the President's first step, but the first step will not be a success unless the second step—the Frazier-Lemke bill—is taken and the purchasing power increased, by increasing the money, the medium of exchange, in the hands of the purchasing public.

Mr. CHASE. I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Give us $2,200,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes under the Frazier-Lemke bill instead of guaranteeing both interest and principal on $2,000,000,000 of tax-exempt bonds, to be sold to coupon clippers, and the farmers will be satisfied. There is not a Member in this House from an agricultural State that does not know of many farmers who have lost their homes by mortgage foreclosure since we left here last spring. They cannot be refinanced under that act which we are now trying to patch up, because they can borrow only 50 percent of the value of the land and 20 percent of the insured permanent improvements, making about 40 percent of the value of the land and improvements, and their present indebtedness is greater than that.

I am fully aware that in spite of the restrictions and limitations of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act the Federal land bank in St. Paul has recently become more liberal and is passing favorably upon applications that it had previously turned down, and I am fully aware that when it does so it violates the law, but the pressure of the Holiday Association and the western Governors who came down here to Washington and told the administration the truth about agricultural conditions became too great.

Why not do away with all of these limitations and restrictions and keep our campaign and platform pledges and do something real for the farmers? Why always deny to the farmers the right to have something to say about their own business? Why blindly push over this legislation which they do not want? May I call attention to the Members of this House that last spring, when this Emergency Farm Mortgage Act was under consideration, the farmer representatives of 28 States came down here and, in a meeting in Senator FRAZIER's office, in the presence of Senators and Representatives, told the Congress of the United States that they did not want that act; that they wanted no substitute for the Frazier-Lemke bill. Yet, in spite of that mandate from farm leaders, and under gag rule, we passed this so-called make-believe "Farm Mortgage Act."

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. LEMKE. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN. How does the condition of the farmers in North Dakota compare now with a year ago?

Mr. LEMKE. The only difference is now we have the Farm Holiday Association; we do not give a continental how much we owe; we do not pay and we cannot pay. That is the only difference.

Mr. ALLEN. How does the number of foreclosures now compare with a year ago?

Mr. LEMKE. In North Dakota the Governor has declared that there shall be no foreclosures and no foreclosures are permitted. That is not because the Federal Government has done anything for us, but because the Federal Government has refused to listen to us and refused to listen to 30,000,000 of the population of this Nation.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. It is my impression that we should have an interest rate as low as 2 percent. Would the gentleman favor that?

Mr. LEMKE. It is fixed at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent amortization on the principal in the Frazier-Lemke bill as drawn.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Does the gentleman not think 2 percent would be satisfactory?

Mr. LEMKE. The gentleman, I think, means this: 1-percent interest and 1-percent amortization. The big bankers get it for less. They get the Federal Reserve notes for the cost of printing, seven tenths of 1 cent per bill. I am in favor of the same rate for the farmers, but I am willing to take the interest that the Frazier-Lemke bill offers, if I cannot get a better rate.

Mr. LUNDEEN. What I mean is, 1-percent interest and 1-percent amortization.

Mr. LEMKE. All right. I am for that. The gentleman may offer such an amendment when the Frazier-Lemke bill comes up, and I will be with him.

Mr. LUNDEEN. One more question. The farmer is worse off today in the Midwest than he was a year ago, is he not?

Mr. LEMKE. He is in our part of the country. I do not know about other parts of the United States.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TRUAX. The gentleman knows that I have been somewhat caustic at times in criticism of present farm-relief measures. I think the gentleman will admit, however, that there has been some success achieved in the administration of the A.A.A. Act.

For instance, the price of corn has been fixed by lending money at 45 cents a bushel and locking up the crib. I understand this has done a lot of good in States like Iowa, Nebraska, and other States where they sell practically all of their corn.

Mr. LEMKE. Before a loan can be made on corn the farmer is asked to sign the hog-and-corn contract, the terms and provisions of which are contrary to the western spirit of progress. Such contracts contain restrictions and limitations which the average farmer cannot comply with and will not comply with. While some loans have been made under the hog-and-corn contracts, it is a grave question whether the farmers making them are the gainers or the losers. There is not a Member on the floor of the House but knows that the Iowa and Nebraska farmers are not satisfied. Most of the good accomplished by these so-called "loans" originated and exist only in the imagination of members of the Department of Agriculture in Washington. Go to Iowa and Nebraska and you will hear another story—the real story.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I again want to submit for your consideration the provisions of the so-called "Frazier bill" as a proper method of refinancing farm indebtedness.

I recognize the fact that during the special session last spring a motion to substitute the Frazier bill was ruled out of order. Having the very highest regard for our Speaker, I may say at this time that I believe our distinguished Speaker overlooked one point that I made which I believe should have controlled the situation, and I believe that the motion to recommit should not have been ruled out on a point of germaneness. I shall again, today, offer a motion to recommit, striking out the provisions of the bill we have under consideration and substituting therefor the provisions of the Frazier bill, under the theory that a bill dealing with two or more related subjects can be amended by an additional related subject, even though the various methods for the purpose of refinancing agricultural indebtedness are very dissimilar in many respects. I shall offer this motion this afternoon, and I hope the Speaker will hold that the motion is in order, so that the Membership of this House may have an opportunity to vote upon a bill which many Members of the House have felt for the past 3 years is essential to recovery, not only among the farmers of this country but among all the people of the country.

The Frazier bill has been pending in this House for over 3 years. The committees have not given it consideration. We have a petition upon the Clerk's desk at this time asking that the Committee on Agriculture be discharged from further consideration of the bill.

This bill has been supported by the legislatures of more than 20 States of this Union, representing the great farm States of the Nation. It occurs to me that when there is such a great demand for a piece of legislation as there is for the Frazier bill at the present time the Membership of the House should at least be given an opportunity to present that bill upon the floor of the House and ask for its consideration by the Members of the House of Representatives. Not once during the 3 years this bill has been pending have we had an opportunity in the House of Representatives to express our approval or disapproval of the bill.

I take this opportunity of asking the Members of the House of Representatives who are favorably inclined to this more liberal farm legislation to sign the petition so that we may have an opportunity later on, in the event my motion is held out of order, to have the bill considered in this body.

Now, the Frazier bill is not so radical. It does, of course, provide that rates of interest shall be reduced to 1½ percent for farm-mortgage refinancing. I do not consider this as being so radical. To my mind a system of 5- or 6- or 7-percent interest is not so holy that we cannot do anything to change the system. We must recognize the fact that the American people today are burdened with about $10,000,000,000 of yearly interest which they must pay. To my mind the welfare of this country does not demand a continuation of this policy. We can well take action here to reduce the interest rates on farm mortgages, and I believe this will have a wholesome effect and a very direct effect in reducing interest rates all the way down the line, and I believe this will be helpful to the country rather than harmful.

The other important feature of the Frazier bill is that it provides for the issuance of Federal land-bank bonds, which will be turned over to the Federal Reserve System with instructions that the Federal Reserve turn back to the Federal land bank Federal Reserve notes, currency of this great country of ours, to be used for the purpose of refinancing agricultural indebtedness.

It seems to me, as the gentleman from North Dakota so ably stated, this is exactly in harmony with the present policy of the administration. The administration has given every indication that it will go quite a long way in the matter of monetary reform. Just the other day the President of the United States sent to this body a message in which he made it clear that it was the administration's intention to revalue the gold dollar. In my mind such legislation, without supporting legislation forcing the issuance of more currency, would not materially help the situation. I do not want to be understood as finding fault with the administration's monetary policy up to this point. I believe the administration has gone along cautiously. Every action on the part of the administration thus far with reference to the monetary policy has been amply justified and each a step in the right direction.

We are coming now to the point where we are to revalue the gold dollar, and if we are to pursue that policy we must go one step further and issue new and additional currency with the gold reserve that will be established after the dollar is revalued. [Applause.] We must get the currency in circulation. Increasing the value in dollars of the gold in the Federal Treasury is not going to materially increase commodity prices.

What we need is less interest-bearing, tax-exempt Government bonds and more currency, and the Frazier bill affords a splendid opportunity to carry out this program.

I appeal to the Membership of the House to stop that policy of putting out more tax-exempt bonds; stop the policy of continuing to say that the Government shall pay interest on Government bonds when there is such a crying need in the country at this time for more currency.

The enactment of the Frazier bill would increase commodity prices. It would do more: It would say to the people that the United States Government will not put its stamp of approval upon a system that compels the American people to pay interest at the rate of $10,000,000,000 a year. It will be the beginning of the end of high interest rates and put interest at a rate the farmer can afford to pay. Under present conditions it is ridiculous to assume that the farmer can ever get out of the dilemma in which he finds himself.

Now is the ideal time to support this legislation in the interest of the farmer. Give the farmer a new deal, give him an opportunity to rise out of the situation now overburdening him.

I appeal to the Membership of the House to give consideration to the provisions of the Frazier bill. I ask you to look upon it not only as a bill in the interest of agriculture but as a bill in the interest of the American people, a bill that recognizes the need of rehabilitating about one quarter of the population of this country by farm-mortgage refinancing made at a low rate of interest, made possible by an expansion of the currency.

I believe this amendment is germane to the bill under consideration. The precedents of the House are, as I have said, to the effect that when a bill has two or more related subjects, a third related subject may be offered as a substitute, even though it would not be germane to the bill if it had only one subject.

This bill has two related subjects, both providing for the refinancing of agriculture, one being the rehabilitation of the land bank system, that the Federal Government shall guarantee the bonds, and the other related subject, different in all respects, except that it is related to farm-mortgage indebtedness. The other subject is the continuation of commissioner's loans and increasing the amount available for land bank commissioners' loans from $200,000,000 to $800,000,000. They are two separate, different methods of refinancing agricultural indebtedness, and the rule I quoted is applicable, and my motion will be germane to the bill.

I recognize the fact that I am making reference to the rules of the House. I want to present this to your attention because of the fact that during the last session when this motion was ruled out of order there was no reference made to this point—and I highly honor our Speaker—but I think he overlooked the point I made with reference to the point of order made against the motion.

I hope this point will at least be given consideration. I hope it will be given consideration so that the farmers of this country for the first time in 3 years might have a vote upon this bill upon which they are almost unanimous in asking the support of the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY].

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I have served for quite some time on the Committee on Agriculture with our distinguished colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU]. I have always found him alert, energetic, and interesting. For the life of me I cannot see the occasion for becoming so exercised with reference to the matter that he presented to this House. He consumed some 15 minutes talking about a matter that he knows and we know will not be obtainable or that we cannot get, especially at this time. I feel, as a member of this same committee, that I should endeavor within the short time allotted me to talk to you about the provisions of the bill that we are now considering. That, to my mind, is what you gentlemen want to know about, especially those of you who have not had an opportunity to study it.

I should like to talk about the Frazier bill if I had the time, but I deem that to be very unwise at this time. I wish I had the time allotted me to answer my distinguished friend from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE]. It is much easier to be destructive than it is to be constructive, and I say to him in passing that when he attacks the Agricultural Adjustment Act, when he says that no good has come from the Farm Marketing Act of 1933, there is evidence in your district and in mine and throughout this Nation which answers every word that he uttered in the criticism that he launched and in the special cases he referred to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. Yes; gladly, to my distinguished chairman.

Mr. JONES. Just for the purpose of calling to the gentleman's attention the fact that in the administration of the Farm Credit Act the second largest total amount of loans has been made in the district in which Wisconsin and Minnesota are located; and that $16,000,000 of loans were actually closed in Minnesota before January 1, in 8 months' time, which is 4 times as much as was made in the average State in that time. So that the law has done something in that State that is worthwhile.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. DOXEY. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. I would like to make one observation, and that is that if the Federal land banks are operating better in Minnesota and Wisconsin than they are in other parts of the United States, then I feel sorry for the rest of the country.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the contribution of our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], and if I had time I might talk about some of the facts and figures the record shows and the results that have been accomplished in the districts of these two distinguished gentlemen who have preceeded me; but in the language of Robert Burns we will just pass it by saying—

> Oh wad some power the giftie gie us
> To see oursel's as others see us!
> It wad frae monie a blunder free us,
> And foolish notion.

We cannot make progress and go forward in the measure that is before us on this occasion by launching attacks—some of them I say advisedly are unwarranted—upon legislation that we have passed here as a part of this program to relieve distressed agriculture and the plight of the farmer.

The agricultural adjustment bill, reported to this House of Representatives by the Committee on Agriculture and enacted into law May 12, 1933, has proven to be one of the greatest and most beneficial pieces of legislation ever passed by Congress.

Its purpose generally is "to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, to raise revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of such emergency, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes."

It is divided into three broad titles. Title I relates generally to agricultural adjustments—parity prices. Title II relates to agricultural credits—farm indebtedness. Title III relates to financing—dealing with the coinage of money and regulating the value thereof.

Under the administration and operation of title I of this act, agricultural commodity prices have been raised and the purchasing power of the farmer has increased. It has worked wonders and has been a great blessing to our entire Nation, and especially to that section of the country that I have the honor to represent—the cotton South, particularly Mississippi, which is almost entirely an agricultural State.

As a result of this legislation we were able to sell our cotton for 10 cents per pound. It has meant the "plow-up" cotton checks—additional money for the cotton farmer who participated in the cotton option plan. It has made possible the 1934 acreage reduction campaign and other methods used and means to be provided that cause us all to know there has truly been a new deal for agriculture.

Under title II, the farmers' loans have been extended, his farm mortgages have been reduced and refinanced so he can carry on.

Farm relief through tax relief has been also given by refinancing of agricultural improvement districts, such as drainage and levee districts.

Title III provides a basis for the monetary policy of this Nation.

We all realize that this law has been on the statute books for such a short while, that it is so broad in its scope and so far reaching in its effect, that it is impossible for the accomplishments under it to result in the complete restoration of distressed agriculture within the short while it has been administered.

There is plenty of work yet to be done by this administration to help and relieve the deplorable condition of agriculture.

I know Mr. Roosevelt, our great President, is a friend to agriculture. This administration by heroic efforts has instilled new life into the farmer. This Congress has in the past, and I feel certain will at this present session, pass such laws as will enable the work that has just begun, so to speak, to continue and accomplish the purposes designed and set forth in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

During the extraordinary session of the Seventy-third Congress the Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor and privilege to be a member, also considered and reported to this House what is known as the "Farm Credit Act of 1933", which became a law on June 16, 1933. The purpose of this Farm Credit Act was to strengthen and enlarge the Agricultural Adjustment Act by providing—

For organization within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes.

It takes time to set up the machinery and get in working order to carry out a program of the character set forth in this type of legislation. Naturally, mistakes will be made and adjustments will be necessary. Time and experience will reveal the weak places and point out the difficulties incident to its practical workings toward the accomplishment of its designed purposes. That is the case before us now.

At the beginning of this second session of the Seventy-third Congress this was the motivating power that prompted our great President to send to Congress his first message after he delivered in person that matchless message when this Congress convened on January 3, 1934.

On January 10, 1934, President Roosevelt sent this message to Congress transmitting "A recommendation that the Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1933 be amended to provide responsibility by the Government for the payment of the principal as well as the interest on bonds issued."

Our great leader in this message said as follows:

To the Congress:

I have already suggested to the Congress that one of our tasks, in the light of experience, is to improve and perfect previous legislation.

I now recommend that the Emergency Farm Credit Act of 1933 be amended to provide responsibility by the Government for the payment of the principal of, as well as interest on, bonds issued.

Two billion dollars of bonds were authorized. While the interest was guaranteed, the ultimate obligation of the Government for payment of the principal was not legally assumed. We should supplement what most of us frankly believe to be the moral responsibility of the Government by adding the necessary legal responsibility. The result of providing a bond on which both the principal and interest are guaranteed would be to put such bonds on a par with Treasury securities.

By setting up a corporation to issue these bonds the important task of refinancing agricultural indebtedness can be continued on virtually a self-sustaining basis.

The Farm Credit Administration is expediting the disbursement of funds. In order that progress in making loans may be uninterrupted, I hope that the Congress will give attention to this subject as soon as possible.

It is true that technically the responsibilities of the Government will be increased by the amount of $2,000,000,000, but it seems in every way right that we thus publicly acknowledge what amounts already to a moral obligation. In any event, the securities to be offered are backed not only by the credit of the Government but also by physical property of very definite value.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 10, 1934.

This message was on the same date—January 10, 1934—referred to my committee, the Committee on Agriculture.

Immediately this committee began work, and today—January 16, 1934—the Committee on Agriculture has before you for consideration H.R. 6670, which is a bill "To provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes."

The general purposes and provisions of this measure have been explained to you by our distinguished chairman, Mr. JONES, and other speakers who have preceded me. However, within the short time left to my disposal I want us to consider together and reason in a logical and practical way the urgent necessity for this legislation as well as some of its outstanding features.

The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, acting through and by the 12 Federal land banks of this Nation, has made substantial progress in extending, reducing, and refinancing farm loans and mortgages.

We all know what a herculean task this has been. Some of us are familiar with some of the difficulties experienced. You know and I know that obtaining farm-mortgage loans has been a slow process, although our distinguished chairman has put in the RECORD how it has progressed and what results have been obtained. But it has been slow for many reasons. I grant that the appraisals in many instances possibly have not been as high as they should have been. There has been some delay in putting the machinery in operation; but the funds that were used, as the record shows and as the hearings disclose and has been told you already, have been used to the best advantages, all things being considered.

We all agree that it is necessary to refinance agriculture for the recovery of this Nation. Although it involves a great expenditure of money, time, and effort on the part of the Government, the step has been taken and there is no turning back now. We must go forward in the right direction and reach the goal—sound, solid, economic recovery of this country. We cannot in this crisis hesitate, falter, waver, or weaken. The Government must help and further the interests of those who deserve aid. All of us must sacrifice and cooperate, looking to the fruition of a "more abundant life."

We are on the road to recovery but there are yet many detours before we reach our ultimate destination. This bill is just one of the many lights that will be necessary to direct us on our way to normalcy.

Its main purpose is for the Government to not only guarantee the interest but also the payment of the principal of the bonds authorized to be issued for refinancing agricultural indebtedness.

Briefly, let us consider the method and manner provided by this measure.

The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is authorized to organize and charter a corporation known as the "Federal farm mortgage corporation."

The Governor will be chairman of the board of directors, which will consist of five members, who will serve without pay. with powers and preogatives as designated in said bill.

The Government is to subscribe and own the capital stock of the corporation amounting to $200,000,000.

The corporation will be authorized to issue bonds in the aggregate amount outstanding at any one time not to exceed $2,000,000,000. These bonds both as to principal and interest will be guaranteed by the Government.

The Federal land banks and the Land Bank Commissioner, in order to obtain the funds to carry on their lending operations, are to use the bonds or the proceeds of said bonds, and they are declared to be lawful investments and may be accepted as security for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds.

These Federal farm mortgage corporation bonds will be secured by consolidated bonds issued by the Federal land banks, by mortgages on farm lands made by the Land Bank Commissioner, and by such other collateral as the Corporation may have available.

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to purchase the bonds of the corporation, and the corporation is also authorized to purchase for cash the consolidated farm-loan bonds of the 12 Federal land banks.

The Secretary of the Treasury has these bonds prepared, subject to the orders of the board of directors of the corporation, to be held by him subject to delivery upon orders of the corporation, the corporation to bear all expenses incident to the preparation, custody, and delivery of such bonds.

These Federal farm mortgage corporation bonds may be exchanged for farm-loan bonds of equal face value.

Except for the purpose of refinancing bonds previously issued thereunder, no Federal land bank will be permitted to issue bonds under the provisions of section 21 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 after 90 days after the enactment of this act.

Mr. LEMKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. I yield.

Mr. LEMKE. The gentleman says it is easier to be destructive than to be constructive. May I ask whether the gentleman considered the issuing of tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds constructive, and the issuing of Federal Reserve notes under the Frazier bill destructive?

Mr. DOXEY. It makes just about as much difference what I think about it as it does what the gentleman thinks about it, because we have a system, and we must continue; and since we are in it, our personal opinion will not change the matter. I believe in taking the situation as it is; and when we come to remedying this situation, if a vote should ever come, I expect that will be one time we will vote together.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY] has expired.

Mr. JONES. I yield the gentleman from Mississippi 2 additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. DOXEY. We will have to hurry along.

Under this bill the farm owner whose land is mortgaged, say, for $5,000, applies to the Federal land bank through its duly authorized representatives, just as he does today under existing laws. The difference is, if his loan is approved, the borrower will either be given cash or $5,000 in Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds. The borrower or mortgagor takes these bonds and discharges his indebtedness to his mortgagee, has his deed of trust canceled and, in turn, gives his land as security to the Federal land bank with which he is doing business—supposedly on more liberal terms.

By virtue of the fact that the bonds are guaranteed by the Government both as to interest and principal, they are to circulate as cash and should make it easier for the farmer to secure his loan, and also the land-bank appraiser should be more liberal and the bank more ready to allow the farmer a higher appraised value on his property, for the Federal land bank received the bonds by an exchange of its bonds—which today are only guaranteed by the Government as to interest—for these Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds which are guaranteed by the Government both as to interest and principal.

In other words, the Government is trying to make it easier for the farm landowner to obtain a loan from the Federal land bank by the provisions of this law.

We know that the bonds of the Federal land banks are not worth par. We know the facts are that none of them have gone on the market. In answer to the gentleman from New York who inquired about these bonds, I may say that the facts are that the bonds heretofore issued, where only the interest was guaranteed, are in the possession of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation because that corporation loaned the Federal land bank the money that they have been doing business with.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Does this bill guarantee the payment of the principal as well as the interest?

Mr. DOXEY. It guarantees the payment of the principal as well as the interest, absolutely.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Of course, that is necessary to put the confidence of the people behind the bonds. There was some difficulty with the farm-loan bonds and the home-loan bonds in the past.

Mr. DOXEY. That is exactly right. This will eliminate and iron out some of the difficulties, and I think the same principle will be applied in short order by this Congress to the home-loan bonds, which I feel is necessary in order not to retard progress, and in order to bring about the result which I know this Congress intended when it passed this type and character of legislation.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I represent a municipal area, and, of course, we do not know much about farmers, but we are willing to go along with you on your farm relief if you go with us on our home-loan legislation.

Mr. DOXEY. You will find the farmer and his representatives here always ready to cooperate with you. We appreciate your help, and we are going to pass this bill with your help.

Without assuming the role of a prophet, I, nevertheless, predict that this Congress within the near future will pass similar laws in an effort to assist the home owners whose property is mortgaged and located in cities, towns, and villages.

The home-loan bonds should also be guaranteed by the Government both as to principal and interest and thereby enable the home owners to share in the Government's generosity just as the farm owners are intended to be benefited by this legislation.

We all realize that the desired results of a law depend upon its administration. It is earnestly and sincerely hoped that this law will be wisely and fairly administered by those charged with the duty of administering it. We can pass any number of laws designed to relieve the distressed, but unless they are administered properly they will miss their mark and fail to accomplish the results intended by Congress, which enacts laws but does not administer them.

This bill is brought on the floor of the House by our committee and is wide open for amendments. If you can make this bill a better bill by amendments, we welcome your proposals, for it is our purpose and desire to make this a workable and practical piece of legislation.

Do not try to amend this bill for the purpose of retarding its passage. Let us all join together and pass this bill today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has again expired.

Mr. DOXEY. I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. We have now before us for consideration H.R. 6670 which is a bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes.

I am glad that this administration has in the past and is now taking such a vital interest in the welfare of agriculture. The President of the United States, a few days ago in a message to Congress, asked for further legislation to help agriculture and this bill is intended to carry out his request.

The first section of the bill provides:

> That the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, hereinafter in this act referred to as the "Governor", is authorized to organize and charter a corporation to be known as the "Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation", to consist of the Secretary of the Treasury or an officer of the Treasury designated by him, the Governor, the Land Bank Commissioner, and two officers of the Farm Credit Administration to be designated by the Governor.

The bill provides that the directors shall receive no additional compensation for their services as directors of the corporation, but shall only be allowed the necessary traveling and subsistence expenses when engaged in the business of the corporation outside of the District of Columbia.

The bill provides that the directors shall have power to adopt such bylaws and amendments to the charter of the corporation as they deem necessary for the conduct of the business of the corporation.

Section 2 of the bill, which is very important, reads as follows:

The corporation shall have succession until dissolved by act of Congress; shall have power to sue and be sued in any court, to adopt and use a corporate seal, to make contracts, and to acquire, hold, and dispose of real and personal property necessary and incident to the conduct of its business; and shall have such other powers necessary and incident to carrying out its powers and duties under this or any other act of Congress as may be provided by law or in its charter and bylaws or in any amendments thereto. The corporation shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government. The corporation, with the consent of any board, commission, independent establishment, or executive department of the Government, may avail itself of the use of information, services, facilities, officers, agents, and employees thereof, in carrying out the provisions of this act.

Section 3 of the bill provides:

The capital of the corporation shall be in the sum of $200,000,000, which shall be subscribed by the Governor on behalf of the United States in such amounts and at such times as he deems necessary for the purposes of the corporation. For the purpose of such capital subscription, the funds and proceeds thereof made available to the Land Bank Commissioner under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 and the mortgages taken by the Commissioner and the credit instruments secured thereby are hereby transferred and made available to the Governor.

Section 4 of the bill provides for an expansion of the capital of this organization to the aggregate sum of $2,000,000,000. The bonds issued by this corporation for the aid of farm mortgage relief are fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States and such guaranty is expressed in the face of each bond.

The guaranty of these bonds both as to principal and interest should enable the corporation to obtain money and loan it to those in distress on account of having their farms mortgaged at a much lower rate of interest than heretofore, and should guarantee adequate relief to every farmer who has a mortgage on his farm and desires to refinance it through this plan.

There are now outstanding more than $9,000,000,000 of mortgages against the farm lands in the United States. Agriculture cannot be successful with this kind of condition carried on, and some plan must be adopted whereby this debt may be extinguished and save this enormous interest to the farmers who are feeding and clothing the world.

Debt is a horrible thing, and I think we have all learned a wonderful lesson. If the debts on homes and farms can be paid off, I am sure we are not going to get in this condition again.

The legislation enacted by this Congress at its last session for the aid of agriculture has been very fruitful and helpful. The act when applied to cotton alone caused that crop this year to bring to the farmers of the South $317,000,000 more than it would have brought without the aid of this act.

When we apply the remedies that have been enacted for all classes of agriculture during the last year, which will amount to around a half billion dollars in relief, with the action of the President in revaluating gold, which will manifestly aid agriculture, and by the use of a double standard of money as is provided for now, I see no reason why we should not have opened up to us a market with the world which will take all the cotton we can produce in the United States. There was a time when we produced 85 percent of this commodity, and we should do that now.

There are other measures now pending in this Congress which I hope to see passed for the aid of agriculture. Agriculture is the basis of all our wealth. If we will take care of it, with the other means that are being used to give employment to the unemployed, we will soon lift ourselves out of this depressed condition and once more be a happy, prosperous people. [Applause.]

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the President has recommended an amendment to the Emergency Farm Credit Act providing for the guaranty by the Government of the principal, as well as the interest on $2,000,000,000 of Federal land-bank bonds. In the original act only the interest was guaranteed and not the principal. The President says:

It is true that technically the responsibilities of the Government will be increased by the amount of $2,000,000,000, but it seems in every way right that we thus publicly acknowledge what amounts already to a moral obligation.

I am in hearty sympathy with this recommendation of the President. In addition, I think that the Government should guaranty both the principal and interest of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation bonds in a like amount of $2,000,000,000. The same moral obligation rests upon the Government with respect to these bonds. The Government has guaranteed the interest on them. By guaranteeing the principal of both classes of bonds, the bonds will readily sell at par and mortgagees will be glad to accept them in exchange for their mortgages.

I was a member of the Banking and Currency Committee that proposed the Rural Credits Act in 1916 and have been a student of such legislation since.

During the Seventy-second Congress I prepared and introduced a bill to create Federal rural mortgage land banks as a separate agency from the Federal land banks, through which loans might be made to farmers. I reintroduced this bill on March 13, 1933 (H.R. 3209). This bill provides for the guaranty by the Government of the principal, as well as the interest, of the Federal land-bank bonds and is almost identical in purpose.

The reason I introduced this bill was that I feared the Government did not have sufficient control under existing law over the Federal land banks, and the bill which I prepared authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for all the stock, and during the next few years, and until the farmers throughout the country have subscribed for sufficient stock, the entire management of the land banks would be under the supervision and control of the Government. The criticism against this legislation enacted by Congress is against its administration.

At the time I introduced this bill the records showed that there were outstanding loans by farmers secured by mortgages in the sum of $9,468,000,000. In addition they own approximately $4,000,000,000 not secured by farm mortgages. This is a staggering sum. There are approximately 6,500,000 farmers in this country. Practically all of them are in a distressed condition and many of them need financial assistance to save their homes. At that time the Federal land banks had outstanding mortgages aggregating $1,146,000,000.

I trust that earnest consideration will be given to the suggestions of the President, and in this connection want to suggest one or two amendments:

First. I think that the Government, with safety, can extend loans to the amount of 70 percent of the appraised normal value of the land and 40 percent of the value of the insured permanent improvements. If the Home Owners' Loan Corporation is justified in exchanging bonds to the amount of 80 percent of the homes on which loans are made, surely a larger percentage may with safety be loaned on the permanent insured improvements on farms.

Second. The Farm Credit Act of 1933 authorized loans to be made direct to farmers where there were no local loan associations, but for such loans they were charged an extra one half of 1 percent. To be frank, these local loan associations served no useful purpose. The bill which I introduced authorized direct loans to be made at the same rate as through local loan associations. The members of local loan associations seldom, if ever, meet; and if they do, it is not for the purpose of discussing farm questions generally but to consider some application for a loan. Several years ago when I introduced a bill to this effect it was favorably recommended by the Farm Loan Board. This additional one half of 1 percent charge should be repealed and direct loans should be made at the same rate as those made through local loan associations. One or more agents of land banks should be appointed in each county to assist farmers in making out and forwarding their applications for loans. They should advise the farmers of all the requirements and in this way greatly expedite action on their loans.

Third. If the Government is to guarantee the principal, to the amount of $2,000,000,000, as well as the interest, on Federal land-bank bonds, there should be a provision in the law to give the Government control over the management of the banks. The guarantee by the Government of the principal of these bonds, as well as the interest, will enable the land banks to sell their bonds at par and secure additional funds to relieve the more distressed farm mortgages throughout the country.

The bill which I introduced not only provides for the guaranty of the principal and interest on these bonds but for making loans at a higher percentage of the appraised normal value of the land and improvements and for direct loans to farmers, but it also obligated the farmer to stipulate in his application that he would not make a second mortgage on his land. This would compel the farmer to retain an interest in his home, keep up his improvements, rotate his crops, terrace his land to prevent erosion, take better care of his improvements, and really enhance the value of his land.

In my judgment, this is a most important provision and one that should not be overlooked and should be incorporated in any new legislation that may be proposed. If the farmer makes a first mortgage to the land bank and thereafter gives a second and third mortgage on his land, he soon becomes discouraged and loses his interest in his farm, and does not take the same interest in his land and improvements, and this results in many cases in his losing his home. I think this is a very important provision, as we should encourage every farmer to retain an equity in his home, and we should assist him as much as we can with safety to refinance his mortgage, pay his taxes, and other liens against his land.

The farmers of the country, including producers of livestock, have been harder hit through a longer period of time than any other class. Their purchasing power is exhausted; this affects all classes of business. The act passed last year was a step in the right direction. It should be amended, as suggested by the President, and both principal and interest of the Federal land-bank bonds, as well as the bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, should be guaranteed and special assistance given to the growers of livestock. I trust that Congress will enact additional legislation for their benefit and that the Secretary of Agriculture will use all the powers of his administration for their assistance.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. May I ask the gentleman whether he has any method to propose whereby a farmer could be prevented from giving a second mortgage after having already given a first mortgage to the Farm Credit Association?

Mr. HASTINGS. He may be required to stipulate in his application for a loan that he will not place a second mortgage on it, and in the event he does it will be in violation of his contract and make his loan become due and payable, just like he is required to stipulate to keep the taxes and insurance on the improvements paid. There is not any question but that he can be required to stipulate such a condition in his application. Then no one will take a second mortgage, because he knows it will violate one of the conditions of the contract, and the land will be subject to immediate foreclosure, and a second mortgage will be of no value.

Mr. HOPE. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to preface my remarks by saying that I am for the bill because it provides the necessary money to finance the undertakings of the administration in the farm-credit program. At the same time, however, I am dissatisfied with the interest rate provided during the special session. To be sure, there is a possibility of a reduced interest rate in the event these bonds are sold at a lower figure than we may now reasonably anticipate. But I think it is one of the jobs of Congress to provide just exactly what the policy shall be with reference to interest charges. It has been my experience with the administrative authorities that if we leave it to their discretion there will be a high rate of interest on the bonds and a correspondingly high rate of interest to the farmers of this country.

Anyone who contacted farmers attempting to obtain loans under the Farm Credit Act during the past summer must realize that the farmers are entirely dissatisfied with the interest rate charged. The interest rate can be safely reduced and the farmer given the benefit of the reduction. There is a reason why he should be given the benefit of a reduced interest rate.

Yesterday I quoted figures with reference to the total outstanding farm-mortgage indebtedness of the country showing that in 1930 it amounted to $9,241,000,000 and in 1932, $8,500,000,000. Between May 1, 1933, and December 31, 1933, 79,254 farm loans were made, totaling $210,565,000. In the State of Wisconsin there were 3,653 loans made, totaling only $7,878,250. In other words, we have not come even close to a solution of the farm difficulties we are in at the present time. The time will come when we will return to Congress, or our successors will, and demand, as we should today, that this interest rate be lowered.

There are two reasons, along with some others, in my opinion, why more loans have not been made. I want to be fair with the administration and state that many are pending and some of them will be successfully concluded in the coming few months. However, there are two paramount reasons why more loans have not been made, aside from the administrative difficulties of the act. In the first place, the bonds not being guaranteed, the funds naturally were not available. Secondly, the interest rate is too high to the farmer. When you discuss high interest rate charged the farmer, you go to the very question of restoration of purchasing power. We have been talking for over a year about restoring the purchasing power to the farmers and that if we did restore the purchasing power to the farmers and laborers of this country we would solve the depression.

In that connection I quote from a statement made by the legislative representative of the National Grange in a letter addressed to every Congresssman:

> While it is the declared policy of Congress, as set forth in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, to reestablish and maintain the same price parity between agricultural and industrial commodities which obtained in the pre-war period, the latest index of the Department of Agriculture, issued on December 29, shows that the average level of farm prices now is only 68 percent of the pre-war level. Prices paid by farmers for commodities bought stand at 118. This makes a spread of 50 points to the disadvantage of agriculture.

Then I quote from one of our local newspapers, and one that is not at all unfriendly, by any means, as you will judge by the title, "United States Aid Boosts Farm Income Here." That refers to one particular county. Then they proceed to say that the "dairy farmers were aided for a short period through the establishment of a Chicago milk-marketing code and a subsequent advance in price, but on December 20 the entire agreement was withdrawn."

And again:

> Prices of milk paid by factories were considerably lower most of the time but showed some improvement late in the year as trade agreements went into effect. During December, however, there was a bad break in butter and cheese prices. Prices of livestock remained low throughout the year. Hogs, after advancing well above $5 during the fall, dropped back practically to the $3 mark before the year ended, imposition of processing taxes tending to depress rather than raise the price. Feeds of all sorts were scarce during the year, and prices high in relation to livestock prices.

My point is this, that if we make an honest attempt to restore the purchasing power of the farmers of this country we will go a long way toward recovery and that we are kidding ourselves when we attempt to keep the farmers down and prevent them from going to the open market to purchase their normal needs. We are kidding ourselves if we expect to have any return to normalcy under any such condition as that. I submit for your consideration at this time that we ought to declare fearlessly the program of providing a lower interest charge to the farmers of this Nation.

Mr. HOPE. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, we are a great nation; in fact, we sit down in the morning at our breakfast table and we ask a beneficent God to be kind to us, to give us weather, to give us rain, to give us sunshine, so that we may produce the necessary blessings of life and then, after our prayers are answered and a great abundance is given unto us, we turn around and destroy that which we asked the Lord to give us.

I always knew we were crazy. I always knew the system was crazy, but I never did think we would ever come to the time where we would take crutches away from crippled soldiers, pensions away from our patriots, cut our Federal employees' wages, and tax ourselves good money to destroy the things that it cost us money to produce. This is just exactly what we have done, and it is against all laws, both the laws of God and of nature.

This great Christian Nation of ours! If there is no other thing that we can say that we accomplished in the last administration, we can at least say this: We can say that for centuries and centuries, according to Indian mythology and lore, the Indians of the arid territory in our great Southwest, the Maricopas, the Pimas, the Apaches, the Utes, the Hopis, and various other tribes, used to pray to various animals and spirits; and among the birds and the gods that they had was the blue eagle. The blue eagle was known among them as the "thunder bird", the bird that brought rain. So as far as I can see, even our blue eagle is not even original. Our Christian Nation stole it from the heathen Indians, whom we have been trying to Christianize for several hundred years.

This blue eagle, so far as the good it has done in my State is concerned, reminds me a great deal of the goofus bird. The "goofus" bird is the only bird known to man that flies backward. He has no place to go and forever to get there, and they say that the only damn reason that he flies backward is because he does not give a damn where he is going, but he likes to see where he has been. [Laughter.] Now, let us at least take on as much intelligence as the "goofus" bird. Let us look back and see where we have been. Let us see what we have done, and let us not do it over again.

In my estimation, with this bill we are simply doing the same thing over again. We are simply going to work now and we are putting a shot into the arm of the patient that we know is going to die; in fact, the corpse is already cold, but we are going to put several billion dollars more into that corpse. Not only this, but the very money changers we were going to drive out of the temple are invited to come back and buy these bonds and take some more from us, tax exempt, of course.

With our estimated debts at the end of this session of $32,800,000,000 at 4 percent we are paying interest alone to the money changers amounting to $1,280,000,000, or approximately $120 for every man, woman, and child, regardless of color, race, or creed, whether they have their right senses, are on the outside of penitentiaries and insane asylums, or whether they are inside; or about $600 to every family of five.

Where are we going to end? Where are we going? Possibly there is some consolation in the fact that we might as well hang for a sheep as a lamb. We have been using the agricultural situation as a political football for the last 20 years, and every move that has been made here to help the farmer has put the farmer deeper in the hole and put the Nation deeper in the hole, and has destroyed industry along with the farmer.

In the month of December hogs reached on the average the lowest price they have ever brought for the past 50 years at South St. Paul, of $2.85 a hundred.

The farmer with corn in his bins—they were helping out by lending him 45 cents a bushel on his corn; and it takes a bushel of corn to make approximately 10 pounds of pork. At that rate a bushel of corn turned into pork would sell for 28¾ cents, while if the farmer borrowed money from the Government at 45 cents a bushel, he could borrow the money on his corn and say, "To hell with the Government! I get more in the loan than I can get for the corn after I put it into pork."

This is the situation, and all the time, while the N.R.A. is supposed to be helping the farmer, it has helped only the big packer and the big gambler.

I want to give you just a few figures.

Swift & Co.'s year book for 1934 shows that the net income of the company for the year 1933 was $10,149,582.22. These figures are rather interesting in view of the fact that they show a loss in the preceding year of five million three hundred and seventy-seven thousand and some odd dollars. The Wilson Packing Co., in its statement of October 28, 1933, shows net earnings of $2,935,000 compared with a loss of $273,192 for last year. The Cudahy Packing Co. shows net earnings of $1,813,000 against $905,000 a year ago. The Hormel Co., of Austin, Minn., shows a net profit, after all taxes are paid, of $635,780 compared with $464,000 the preceding year.

So on down the line. Everything, practically, that the farmer buys or that the farmer deals in, the farmer gets the rotten end of the deal; and as to the N.R.A. up in my State, in many of our communities the farmers are banding together in lots of three or four or five hundred and marching into the cities and villages and making every business man take down the blue eagle.

We can get good 50-cent overalls for $1.50 a pair and everything else in practically on a like basis. A set of cutter knives for a silo filler that ordinarily costs $7.50 now costs the farmer $21; and when he asks why, he is told, "N.R.A." Call it chiseling or call it what you please.

We had a prohibition law that made snoopers out of a few people because there were a few people interested in finding out about the bootlegger, but the N.R.A. has made a bunch of stool pigeons and snoops and spies out of practically every man in the United States that is in business, spying on his neighbor, and we are building up an ethical standard by snooping and spying and being stool pigeons.

Oh, my friends, there is one thing to do. I hear man after man get up here and say, "I do not believe in tax-free bonds." Neither do I, but I have guts enough to vote against them. I am going to vote the way the President told you he was going to do. I believe that we should pass the Frazier bill as a substitute with the interest rates in it of 1½ percent and issue money without any interest, leaving the money changers out in the cold. When we do that, Members of this House, then we will be standing by the President, doing the thing he asked us to do when he said that we should drive the money changers out of the temple.

With all the arguments here we cannot remedy these things without going on and making more mistakes. I am for the farmer. Twenty-four States in this Union have petitioned and implored the Representatives in Congress asking Congress to favor the Frazier bill, but we could not even get it considered in committee. I hope you will substitute the Frazier bill for this bill and do away with the money changers and the high rates of interest forever. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE].

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, this bill, H.R. 6670, makes possible the creation of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, with a capital of $200,000,000, all to be subscribed for by the Government.

This corporation will be under the complete domination of the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, because he appoints two directors and can remove them at will. It provides for the issuance and sale of two thousand millions of tax-exempt Government bonds to provide money to be lent to the farmers. It is the purpose of this proposed bill to make easier the operation of the present farm mortgage law passed last spring. It also provides for increasing the amount of money that may be lent upon second mortgages. The existing law provided for two hundred millions to be lent on second mortgages. This amount is almost exhausted. Under the present bill this fund is increased by six hundred millions. The second-mortgage provision of the law has been found to be very effective and helpful.

The present extremely low valuations placed upon farm property by the Federal land-bank appraisers has made the second-mortgage provision the only chance many farmers have to secure money for refinancing. The second-mortgage provision allows a loan of 75 percent of appraised value and up to a total amount of $5,000. Had it not been for this provision, the law we passed last spring would have been almost a complete failure. We should never lose sight of the fact that there will be a tremendous loss, perhaps as much as 50 percent under this second-mortgage provision. Notwithstanding the colossal losses that will result from the second mortgages, the plan has saved thousands of farm homes from immediate foreclosure.

The partial failure of the present law has resulted largely from its administration. No truer statement was ever made than that by Pope, when he said:

> For forms of government let fools contest,
> Whatever is best administered is best.

The Federal land banks have been administered almost solely in the interest of the mortgagees. They were not organized to take care of the immense amount of business suddenly thrown upon them. Almost one half of all commercial banks in the farming area that were doing business 5 years ago are in some form of a receivership, and the remaining solvent banking institutions in that area are not lending money to those engaged in horticultural and agricultural pursuits. Five years ago there were also thousands of individuals lending money to farmers for capital investment as well as for operating expenses. Many insurance companies were then freely lending to farmers for capital investment. Today practically all of these lending activities have ceased to furnish money for capital investment or operating expenses.

When the agricultural producer needs and must have money to stay the hand of foreclosure and pay necessary operation, he now finds the Federal Government the one possible source of supply. A few days ago there was placed on our desks a statement of Governor Myers, of the Federal Farm Credit Administration, showing an immense increase in business and total loans of more than a billion and one quarter dollars. Large as it appears on paper, it cannot aggregate as much as 5 percent of the amount lent 5 years ago to the same producers. Much as the Federal land bank has done, it has not supplied the credit necessary to successful operation of the producing interests.

The present proposed bill will aid only in a minor degree. The entire Federal land-bank system should be reorganized and be farm-controlled and not banker-controlled as it is today. Loans should be made directly from the bank to the farmers. The local organizations of the system have failed to function. Before the Agricultural Committee of the House the Government officials of the lending agencies admitted that the appraisers for the bank were instructed to estimate the value of land by capitalizing the net income on the price level that prevailed from 1909 to 1914, which was estimated to be 40 percent higher than the present price level. These officials further stated that if present prices of farm products were used as a basis, there could be no farm loans made at this time, as there was very little or no value in land when estimated upon the profits to be made by raising farm products and selling them at present price levels. I believe this is true. To my mind it proves conclusively that the present law and the proposed bill are both doomed to flat failure, and money lent under this law will be largely lost unless there is a decidedly higher level for farm products. Creating scarcity by subsidy cannot be a permanent cure. This year we have enjoyed a real increase in the price of wheat owing to the fact that we raised a 60-percent crop, not producing enough in the United States to care for our own needs. This shortage, together with the money from the allotment plan, has in many sections brought the returns to the wheat grower nearly up to the cost of production. Acreage will be somewhat reduced next year. Supposing wind and weather are favorable, and we produce practically a normal crop, which is very possible, then we may find our prices possibly one third less next year.

The underlying farm problems have not yet been solved, nor have they been seriously attacked by legislative bodies. I mean interest, taxes, marketing, and the creation of demand for farm products by providing necessary buying power. The hungry world would soon make our surpluses vanish if that hungry world could only work, earn, and eat. The financiers of the East might just as well face the facts and admit with us of the West—we who hold the titles to the farming land—that the country is on the road to ruin and bankruptcy unless there is a real advance in prices of farm products. I know there has been an improvement, and I am proud of it; and this administration is largely responsible and should have the credit, but the improvement that we have made is not built on a firm foundation. Some farm products have received practically no benefit. Beef, hogs, butter fat, and other, many other products are still selling below the cost of production. Interest cannot be paid, taxes cannot be met until there is a real advance in the prices of farm products.

We followers of the administration are proud of the fact that millions have been put back to work. thanks to the courage and advanced thinking of our President, who has been extremely active in his effort to find employment for idle millions. Last week 21 who had obtained work in Portland, Oreg., with the C.W.A. telegraphed the President their appreciation of the opportunity. At the same time on the same day 2,000 assembled in a hall in the same city and begged for a chance to labor for their living. One had a job, 99 still on the line of want. We are far from being out of the woods. Our President is certainly trying to solve the problems. I am a follower, I am a defender of this brave, fearless leader.

I am a firm believer in the quantitative theory of money. We are off the gold standard and probably will never return to it. A few years ago we had in our banks deposits of billions of dollars which took the place of currency. These deposits have been seriously depleted, for one half of the banks in the farming area no longer exist and the other half have no money to lend to agricultural interests. We should have more of the circulating medium, so that it will take less hogs and less butter fat to obtain some of this much-desired currency. Yes; a cheaper money, if you please, and a higher value for products.

This bill calls for two thousand millions of tax-exempt Government bonds to be sold to the investing public. I signed the minority report, because I believe it will be far better for all concerned to issue currency as loans are made, then lend the money to the farmer at 2 percent with amortization of 1 percent annually. As the borrowers pay interest and the payments on the principal each year, then let the Government reduce the outstanding currency by an amount equal to the amount collected. By this method the entire debt would be wiped out in about 20 years. It could not in any sense be called fiat money. It would have behind it farm land valued at twice the amount of the outstanding currency.

The farmer ought to have money at 2 percent. He cannot pay high interest because the invested money cannot earn it. High interest means the death of the capitalistic system because it demands an artificial return instead of actual earning. I freely admit that the capitalistic system has been largely responsible for the development of this civilization, but the lender of money has no right to a higher rate of interest than the normal increase of wealth when computed through a series of years, and this is about 2 percent. The attempt to collect enormous dividends and high interest is partly responsible for the threatened collapse of the capitalistic system. Under the plan of issuing currency instead of bonds, there would be a controlled inflation which of itself would force higher prices. Under the Home Loan

Act I would also issue currency instead of selling bonds. The President said but a short time ago that all that the bonds of the United States have behind them is the faith and confidence of the Government. The currency plan suggested in the minority report would have behind it as security homes and farms valued at twice the amount of the outstanding currency. If currency is issued, debts can be paid, interest can be met, prosperity and confidence will return.

The farm problems are wrapped up in and part of the unemployment problem. The long line of unemployed will exist for years to come. Machinery has displaced men and women by thousands. All cannot find employment today even with the 30-hour week. It is said by experts that if industry were producing at the rate of production of 5 years ago, there would still be from three to six millions unemployed, so fast has machinery come to displace the workers. Two years ago it took 2,000 men to make a certain number of automobile bodies. The factory today has automatic machinery which enables 200 men to do the work. One man in the steel industry can do today with the aid of automatic machinery what four men did before the war. This machinery cannot be abandoned. That would be a step backward. Machines are our slaves. Neither can we allow the adroit financiers to capitalize these machines, kick the workers into the streets, and take all the profits resulting from the operations of the machines. Machines eat no potatoes, consume no hogs, use no bread. Unemployed workers must never pile up again as they have in the darkest hours of the depression. At one time almost one third of the adult population was being fed by charity, and one half of the children. Think of the possible effect on future generations! It is simply appalling. Unemployment can be remedied only by long-time planning. The new deal is an honest attempt to save our present capitalistic civilization by abolishing the abuses that have grown up under it. I know the effect of intrenched privilege, and I understand the dominating power of the greedy and the fight they will make to prevent fair dealing for the benefit of the masses. It is not now too late, but it soon may be too late for civilization to save itself.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota case over a State law granting a moratorium on mortgage foreclosures has given courage and hope to those who are struggling for economic justice. We can never return to the old days; we are on a new road, and it is a one-way road. We are not going back. We are trying to maintain a highly developed mechanized industrial civilization side by side with a highly developed and mechanized agricultural civilization.

Nearly one quarter of our people still live on farms. Bankrupt these farmers; take them out of the picture; say to the farmers of America, "You must be peasants forever"; say to the farmers of America, "You can no longer make a profit on your farm products"—and it will mean that the farmers of America will no longer pay interest, no longer pay taxes; the whole system crumbles.

The income-tax returns for 1929 show that 2 percent of the people enjoyed two thirds of the net income of all the people. These returns further showed that 504 of the fortunate multimillionaires had income sufficient, when added together, to buy and pay for all the wheat and cotton grown in the United States, the growing of which required the effort of two and one half millions of people. During the last third of a century the share of capital in the profits of industry has increased more than five times, owing to machinery and mass production. Labor's share has been less than it was a third of a century ago. The share of capital increased five times; the share of labor diminished. No wonder the laboring masses cannot buy farmers' products. The financial world should face this existing situation now, before the hungry, violent mobs gain control.

The bonds and the interest thereon which this bill provides for sale to a trusting public cannot be paid by the farmer borrowers unless they can get more for their products than the actual cost of production. To give employment, money must be provided by billions, not by tax-exempt bond issues but by gift and inheritance taxes.

The Recovery Act of last June provided for a very fair capital levy of $1 on every $1,000 of declared capital of corporations; also of 5 percent of all money earned by corporations before dividends were declared and additional 5 percent where dividends to be declared exceeded 12½ percent. This levy was set aside by Executive order December 31, 1933, because of anticipated returns from the liquor traffic. This capital levy should be reenacted so as to raise, not only the two hundred millions anticipated under the Recovery Act but at least twice that amount annually. Continue the C.C.C. camps, continue to increase the activities of the Civil Works until all may find jobs, continue the activities of the Public Works until there are jobs for all. Stop the issuance of bonds. We cannot close our eyes to the fact that our national debt will be almost doubled in 4 years.

Is there not some solution of our economic problem other than the creation of an enormous and terrifying public debt? Is it not possible that the solution lies in lowered interest rates for the use of money, fewer tax-exempt bonds, and more currency backed by the values in farms and homes?

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat amused, perhaps more or less cynically, by the claims of the gentlemen on the opposite side of the Chamber that the condition of the farmer had materially improved during the last 12 months. So far as my personal observation goes, the exact reverse is true, particularly so far as the livestock farmer is concerned. I can only account for these extravagant claims of our Democratic friends on the theory that they are simply "whistling while passing through a graveyard."

Mr. KNUTSON. How about the dairy farmer?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. And the dairy farmer also. During the congressional vacation I took occasion to go into this subject, more or less, and I found in my district that beef cattle of the first grade were selling as low as 2 cents a pound, and that 3 cents a pound was considered a high figure.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I am sorry, I have not the time to yield. I rose particularly to speak of the plight of the farmer so far as tobacco is concerned, particularly in my district. The tobacco industry has become quite an outstanding industry in east Tennessee, and until the last crop, a very profitable one; and whereas last year the tobacco growers were receiving on an average about 14½ cents a pound for tobacco, during the season just closed they have been receiving on an average less than 9 cents a pound. I have in my hand a transcript of one sale in a warehouse in my home town. This farmer sold 700 pounds of tobacco on January 11, this year, and the price ranged from 1 cent a pound to 10.2 cents a pound. The entire sale amounted to $34.05. On this particular sale the warehouse charges were $1.50 and the commission $4.77, whereas last year on exactly the same transaction, the warehouse charge would have been $1.50 and the then commission would have been $2.86, which means that this farmer on this one transaction sustained a net loss of $3.41, thanks to the beneficent service of the Blue Eagle, to say nothing of the depression in the price of his product.

Mr. Chairman, it is manifest that the tobacco farmer cannot survive these low prices with the added penalty which the N.I.R.A. code inflicts. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I realize perfectly that debate on this bill is futile, although it comes in under the ordinary rules of the House. The chances are there will be few amendments offered and whatever amendments are offered will probably be voted down almost unanimously. This is an administration bill, and it will go through just as the administration wants it. At the end of this debate I understand a motion will be offered to substitute the provisions of the Frazier bill for this bill. I realize that that motion will be held to be not germane, just as it was at the last special session of the Congress, when this same issue was before this body. I realize, furthermore, that when the debate is finished, whatever objections may be offered, everyone will vote for the bill, including myself.

It may seem, therefore, that the offering of any objections or any amendments to the bill is simply a waste of time, and, indeed, in a way it is. I feel, however, that I would not be doing my duty to the people I represent if I did not raise my voice in support of the motion which will be made to substitute the Frazier bill for this bill. The people of the State of Oregon at the last regular session of their legislature and also at the last special session of the legislature, formally memorialized Congress to pass the Frazier bill. Within the past few months 24 other States have also memorialized the Congress of the United States to pass the Frazier bill. The Frazier bill has been endorsed by every national farm organization in this country. It has been endorsed by the Farmers' Union and by the National Grange. It has received more thoughtful, mature consideration over a period of years than any other farm-relief proposal that has ever been made in this country. It is better understood by the people than any other farm-relief proposal.

Almost every agricultural economist of note has declared himself in favor of the Frazier bill as the solution of the farm-mortgage refinancing problem. Yet, for some reason, we have never been able to get the Frazier bill out of committee. Neither have we been able to get the Committee on Agriculture of this House to report the Frazier bill or even to consider it.

Gentlemen will remember when the original of the pending bill was discussed at the last session that there was some hope, in the opinion of most of us, that the provisions of the Frazier bill might be substituted for it. The merits of the Frazier bill, therefore, as opposed to this bill, were very thoroughly discussed. During all of that discussion there was not one word offered in this body in criticism of the Frazier bill. On the other hand, practically everyone who talked freely upon the subject admitted that the Frazier bill was a better bill for the farmer and that if it were possible to bring the Frazier bill before the House they would vote for it.

I ask, What is the reason for such a situation? Why should it be either impossible or improper to bring before this House for consideration a bill in which the majority of us believe? Are we to subserve and substitute all of our own ideas for the ideas of the administration and its economic agricultural advisers? If we are, then I say it is time for this body to adjourn sine die. If not, then I say it is time for the Members of the body to do a little thinking on their own account and begin to function as a legislative body. [Applause.]

I intend to vote for the bill, of course, because it is better than nothing, and because it is the only bill on this subject that will be offered to us by the administration leaders during this session of the Congress, and the only farm mortgage bill which the majority will permit a vote to be taken on. Yet, as between the Frazier bill and the pending bill, I do not see how anyone in the exercise of his own judgment could prefer the latter. The Frazier bill undertakes to refinance all farm mortgages in this country—and refinance them at a rate of interest which the farmers can afford to pay. Everyone knows that the farmer cannot afford, under existing circumstances, to pay 5 percent or 4½ or even 4 percent. Three percent is as much as any agricultural economist has declared the farmer can pay. The Frazier bill undertakes to refinance these mortgages at a total of 3 percent, 1½ percent to be applied upon the principal and 1½ percent to be applied upon the interest, the whole loan to be amortized over a period of 47 years. It undertakes to do this, not by the issuance of bonds, payment of which will have to be borne ultimately by the taxpayers, but by the issuance of Federal Reserve notes based on the farm mortgages themselves. That is not inflation, as some have contended. It is expansion of the currency, if you like, but it is controlled expansion, a safe expansion, and it is a scheme under which the farmer can be refinanced at a rate of interest which he can afford to pay.

Under the present bill, the bonds issued must of necessity carry a high rate of interest. If they do not carry a high rate of interest, then the public will not subscribe for them. The success of the refinancing scheme in the pending bill depends entirely upon the willingness and ability of the public to take up these bonds. Unless they are issued at a higher rate of interest than the farmer can afford to pay, then the public will not buy them and the whole scheme, in that event, would collapse.

Now, I ask why it is not possible for the Committee on Agriculture of this House to give consideration to the Frazier bill and if that committee thinks it is a good bill, to report it out and let us vote upon it. The only argument that has ever been advanced against the Frazier bill is that it is not a part of the administration's program, but if we are to be denied a vote on everything simply because it is not a part of the program, then I repeat the House of Representatives has ceased to function as a legislative body, and it might as well turn over all of its jurisdiction to the executive department.

In conclusion let me say that those of us who favor the Frazier bill represent the opinions and sentiments of more people in the United States than have ever agreed upon any piece of legislation of national importance. There are 30,000,000 farmers in this country. There are 6,000,000 farm families. Organizations representing all of those farmers are unanimously in favor of the enactment of the Frazier bill as a part of any agricultural relief program that may be passed. Until we do this, the farmer will not be given the relief he is entitled to and it will be a long, long time before he can look into the future with any confidence, toward that time which the President has so aptly described as "the better day." [Applause.]

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Would the gentleman be in favor of applying the same conditions to home and other mortgages as are applied in the Frazier bill?

Mr. MOTT. Offhand I would not, because I do not think the necessity exists in the case of home-loan mortgages which exists in farm-loan mortgages.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] has expired.

Mr. JONES. I yield 2 minutes, Mr. Chairman, to the lady from Kansas [Mrs. MCCARTHY].

Mrs. MCCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, a great deal of time has been consumed in the discussion of the Frazier bill, but that measure is not before us at this time. I am just as enthusiastic about the Frazier bill as any person who has spoken, and my name was one of the first attached to the petition to discharge the committee and bring that bill on to the floor, but since we do not have an opportunity to vote on that bill at this time, and it is not properly under discussion, I think we should confine our remarks to the matter in hand. If there is no possibility at this time of getting the Frazier bill enacted, we must make the best of the situation as it really is. On many farms it is impossible to refinance the loans merely because the principal of the bonds is not guaranteed as well as the interest.

I have a letter before me from one of my constituents—and I have received dozens of them just this past week—stating that the land bank had approved the loan, but the mortgage company had not accepted it because this class of Government bonds was selling below par; that the loan companies had refused to take these Government bonds.

With such a situation confronting us there is but one thing to do if we are to save these farm homes, and that is to guarantee the principal as well as the interest on these bonds.

There is a demand for this legislation that is asked today, so if we are really sincere in wanting to help the farmers, we must pass it.

The criticism has been raised that this bill provides more tax-exempt securities. Answering this criticism, let me ask how we can make the mortgagee take the Federal land-bank bonds if they are not tax exempt, when other bonds issued by the Government escape taxation? [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, at the time this legislation was before us last spring I called attention to the plight of the farmer and to the situation existing in my own State with reference to farm mortgages. As I left this Chamber and went over to the old House Office Building I rode up on the "lift", as the English call it, and a gentleman from one of the large industrial cities was asking, partly to himself, I think, and partly to the other gentlemen assembled on the elevator: "Who in hell told the farmers to borrow all this money we have been talking about this afternoon?" This gentleman was soon in this Congress, joining in asking relief for the home owners of the country; and I am glad to say that his attitude toward farmers and farm legislation is not typical of the sentiment among industrial and city Members here. We farmers all want the home owners to be relieved; and we will vote for any bill seeking to accomplish that purpose, if it is fairly drawn. This present bill and this legislation presupposes that there will hereafter be home legislation of a like character.

Last spring I tried to offer some constructive criticisms of the bill then being considered. I said that, while I would support the bill—and I did—I thought it ought to be amended in ways I then pointed out. I believe the same way regarding this bill. This is a bill to refinance farm mortgages. It is not drawn just the way I should like to have it drawn, but I shall support it on the principle that it is better than no further farm-mortgage relief.

It is an old story to say that during the war the farmers were told to produce and to produce intensively. We were told by speakers, propaganda, and by placards all over the country, "Bread will win the war." That is true, because an army must have bread brought up to the front lines. It could not exist otherwise. An army travels upon its stomach and not upon its legs. Therefore our farmers were asked, implored, and compelled to produce and to produce intensively; and large amounts of money were offered in their support at that time, so that they could produce intensively.

At that time prices of land were high and great mortgages were made upon the land, and money was freely loaned to agriculture; but along in 1920 the Federal Reserve Board put upon the farm communities a deflation program. They told us farmers not only that we would be denied the right to borrow money in the future, but that we would be compelled forthwith to pay the money we had borrowed already of that System. The result was that the farmers were grievously and wickedly deflated and they have been in distress ever since. You can easily see the results of that program wherever you may go in farm communities.

At the time this farm-deflation program was started, or just before it, Gov. W. P. G. Harding, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, appeared before the committee. A friend of mine appeared before the committee at the same time. The Governor disclosed the impending program and told what they were about to do to deflate the farm situation by refusing further credit and by absolutely calling in all the outstanding loans. This they proceeded to do. My friend said to the Governor at that time, "Why, Governor, this will ruin the farmers." The Governor, the great Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, then replied, "Well, somebody will farm the land anyway." No more brutal statement has ever been offered by any responsible officer in explanation of any policy. The consequences of that policy have brought ruin and desolation and bankruptcy to farmers generally. It is to be seen the assault upon the farm situation was Federal in nature; and I believe the rescue should be Federal in nature, and that this bill should be passed, being amended now or in the future, if need be, to accomplish our full purpose.

I was for the Frazier bill. I think the Frazier bill, so far as the monetary situation is concerned, is as sound as the law regarding national-bank currency. There is not a dollar's worth of gold behind national-bank currency, not a dollar's worth. All there is behind that currency is the security offered by the bonds of the Federal Government. This is the only security behind national-bank currency. Do you know there is about $1,000,000,000 of national-bank currency now outstanding in this country? Surely the security of Federal bonds added to the security of the land itself should make the money contemplated by the Frazier bill much safer and much better than national-bank currency. There is no better security than the lands and homes of our people.

Before coming to the present session of Congress I sent a questionnaire to the county agents in my district and found, just as I predicted in the speech I made at the time the original bill was before us, that the farm-loan program was not functioning as it ought to do. I found foreclosures were increasing in many places. In some counties the dockets showed that foreclosures were not decreasing but were increasing. In one county on the 8th of November there were 300 accumulated foreclosures. This meant, figuring hastily, that one in every six or seven families was having its property foreclosed. This situation is intolerable. If one out of every seven farmers, or families, are being thrown out of their lands by foreclosures and the sheriff's sales it must be apparent that the other six farmers are only about two jumps ahead of the sheriff. There is very little hope for them under prices now current in the farming communities.

I should like to refer to an abominable situation that has occurred, as I understand, over in the Senate restaurant, where the inalienable rights of the Senators have in fact been alienated. I read in yesterday's paper that the price of a segment of pie over there has been raised from 10 to 15 cents and that they were actually charging the Senators 15 cents a cut for pie. This is atrocious. It does away with all the sanctities of American liberty. From the same paper I also learned from a published recipe what were the ingredients of pie. I found there were lard, sugar, cornstarch, milk, eggs, wheat, and a great many other things in pie. The restaurateur there complained that he had to charge an increased rate for pie because of increased prices generally for these commodities. But in my district today farmers are selling these commodities about as low as ever in history. They are selling their hogs at pitiable prices. All the ingredients of pie are being sold today at pitiable prices. No wheat farmer can prosper under the prices for which he must dispose of his wheat. Sugar enters into pie. A great deal of sugar beets are raised in my district. Sugar beets are sold at pitiable prices. So with eggs and milk and all of the other things. Now the point is this, that the spread between what the farmer gets and what the consumer pays is too large and is really unconscionable. The farmer must be rescued from this situation. He never will be able to pay his mortgage under present commodity prices.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I will go ahead with what I had in mind. Under these mortgage bills the interest rate is altogether too high. As has been pointed out by the gentleman from Oregon, no farmer can pay 4½- and 5-percent interest and his commission charges and expenses, and also pay 5 percent of his loan to the association, which he must do under this set-up. I do not see anything in it of a cooperative nature. They say it is cooperative, and still when I go down to my county seat to get a loan under this bill I do not even know the recipients of other loans. I am not consulted about them and have no concern with them. There is no cooperation about it. I have to pay 4½- or 5-percent interest and still devote 5 percent of my loan to financing the situation, when I am in sore distress myself and am in need of borrowing money and cannot loan it. I cannot finance other farmers. I think this is one feature of the bill that should be amended.

I find also that the interest is too high. The farmers have to pay $1.50 to $2 a day interest under this set-up, which they can ill afford to pay, especially when you consider prices as they are at the present time. There is now a milk strike in the Chicago district. I deplore the fact that there is lawlessness along our highways. There was some lawlessness apparently very near to my district in Iowa last year. However, when farmers are being driven by desperation and their wives and children are being thrown out of their homes they are not going to stand idly by and do nothing. We must look upon that situation with considerable charity, as a Christian should when it affects another. I do not know what I would do if my wife and children were being kicked out of our home. You do not, either. I do know you would resist to the utmost. And we should here and now provide relief for these pitiable conditions so that lawlessness will not be provoked. We must offer relief to these folks. It is due them and there will be no prosperity until they are relieved. I do not mean to say that industry should not be relieved, or that manufacturing ought not to be encouraged. We are together in one boat and when 30,000,000 farm people are destitute and in a pitiable condition then another 30,000,000 people in industries cannot buy and we farmers cannot buy either. Neither of us can buy. Neither of us can sell. Agriculture is basic, and no prosperity can come to the country until it prospers.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Has there been a cessation of foreclosures in the gentleman's district during this past summer and fall?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I will answer the gentleman by saying that I sent out questionnaires to the 14 counties in my district. Two of them did not answer; 6 of them answered that there was an increase in foreclosures; and 6 answered that there were less foreclosures this year than last year. So that on the whole, I doubt whether there was very much difference. I give that information to the gentleman as an indication of what is happening out there in the corn country in the State of Iowa.

The original bill is inadequate and has not functioned, and I cite as an example conditions in my own home county as they existed shortly before I came to Washington. There were 150 applications. In 75 of them commitments had been made, but only 2 of them had been granted and the money furnished. That was sometime ago and it was because the set-up was incomplete.

Mr. JONES. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I favor the enactment of the pending bill, H.R. 6670, which is a measure to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm mortgages, and for other purposes. It supplements the Farm Credit Act of 1933, which is an important part of President Roosevelt's national recovery program. It appropriated $200,000,000 as an emergency fund to refinance farm mortgages in cases where farm owners were in great economic distress and about to lose their farm homes by sacrificial foreclosure sales. It also authorized the issue of bonds in the sum of $2,000,000,000 for sale or for exchange for farm mortgages. As only the interest and not the principal on these bonds was guaranteed, the investing public was slow to buy them and holders of farm mortgages were reluctant to exchange their mortgages for these bonds.

While the Farm Credit Act has saved many thousand farm homes, for several months it was unsympathetically administered by the land banks, who pursued a reactionary and ultraconservative policy under which many safe and sound loans were rejected. The appraisals were so low and the regulations so technical that the benevolent purpose of the act was not being accomplished.

The efficacy of any law is in its wise and sympathetic administration. For more than 4 months I conducted a vigorous campaign to bring about higher appraisals of farm lands and a liberalization of the Federal land bank regulations relating to refinancing farm loans. I carried this fight to President Roosevelt, urging that he require the land banks to make higher appraisals of farm lands and liberalize their loan regulations. Similar campaigns were conducted by others throughout the United States, and as a result there has been a very pronounced liberalization of the regulations in all the land banks, and especially in the St. Louis Federal land bank district.

Lands are now being appraised at higher values and regulations have been liberalized. Within the last 2 months, as a result of that liberalization, there have been hundreds—yes, thousands—of loans made in the United States that had previously been rejected. The trouble is not with the law but with an unsympathetic administration of it.

The pending bill authorizes the Government to guarantee both principal and interest on these bonds. The bonds will be in demand and enable the land banks to make more liberal appraisals and consummate many loans that otherwise would be disapproved.

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL] as much time as he may desire.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, I favor the passage of this bill.

Any measure that means relief to the home and farm owners of America means the stabilization of this country throughout the years. It is necessary that we have a contented, happy, and prosperous farming people if industry is to be permitted to thrive. This bill is a step in the right direction. I am proud to be a member of the Committee on Agriculture which proposes this measure for passage.

There are features in the bill which I should like to see modified. One of them would be to fix the interest at the lowest possible rate, but since this is not practicable, in view of the necessity of the bond sale to make the money available to the farmers and the expense of its administration, then the bill as proposed offers the best terms possible now.

This new Federal corporation is to be set up and its bonds will be guaranteed by the Government, both as to interest and principal, for which the Federal land banks may execute their consolidated bonds. The Federal land banks may use the guaranteed bonds of the corporation to make loans, or by selling the bonds and using the proceeds from such sales in making disbursements of loans. The maximum amount of bonds of the Corporation which may be outstanding at any one time is $2,000,000,000.

The farmer needs relief. His income must be increased. I wish the bill went further. I would support a bill in the House that would guarantee to the farmers of America the cost of production on their crops, with a profit. The farmers feed and clothe the world. They should share more in its profits. They produce the wealth of the world. They make possible the progress of all other lines of business. Without agriculture there would be no industry, no mining, or manufacturing in this country or elsewhere.

The farmer is entitled to the benefit of more liberal consideration in Congress. For the first time this bill gives him the benefit of Government bonds as a basis of credit. This is a privilege he should have had long ago, for upon the prosperity of the farmer depends the hope of the people. He is the Nation's defender in peace and in war. The hope of America rests upon the security of the home owners.

If anarchy and revolution overtake us in the years to come, it will break out in the cities and commercial centers and not among the farmers. They are the sheet anchors of our national safety and well-being. They afford the basis of the Nation's credit. This bill, which extends to them additional credit, is a forward step in the right direction back to prosperity. It permits the farmer to use the credit of the Government, which he himself largely produces. It does for the farmer what the Government has been doing for the bankers.

It puts credit behind him for the first time in the Nation's history, and the first time it has ever been done in the world. It is part of the "new deal." The interest rate fixed in the bill is not to exceed 4½ percent. I hope it will not be necessary to charge this amount. The farmer needs credit, he needs extension of time in which to pay his debts and taxes which have come upon him because of falling prices of his products and reduced earnings, through no fault of his. The panic was not brought on by him. It was the creation of the big bankers of America. They alone should have borne the loss.

The cheapening of the dollar and a raise in commodity prices is what our farmers need. This will enable him to pay his debts and become sovereign and independent again. This we are anxious to have take place, and not until then will the wheels of industry begin to turn.

The merchants and business men will be prosperous only when the purchasing power of the farmers is restored to them. It will be a new day in America when this takes place. It will mean happiness and contentment to 120,000,000 Americans when the farmer receives for his labor and toil that to which he is so justly entitled. Let us make it possible for him to sell his livestock at a profit. Let him have for his wheat, cotton, corn, tobacco, and other crops such prices as will afford a fair return upon his investment and a proper reward for his daily toil. Then and only then will prosperity be ours. May a kindly Providence guide us aright in our efforts to serve, and may the dawn of prosperity and a new day be speedily ours. This will come if the people will continue to send unselfish men to represent them, men who are interested to serve those who honor them rather than to profit themselves.

Let us remember that he lives most who serves the best.

I am glad to see that there is no serious opposition to the passage of this most important and helpful measure.

Save the farmers and you will save America. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to congratulate the chairman and the members of the committee for incorporating in the bill a principle which should have been incorporated in the bill that passed the last session of the Congress.

I have always maintained that where a corporation such as is established by this bill is created for relief purposes and for the general welfare of the country, and bonds are authorized to be issued in order to carry out the objective of the legislation, not only should the interest be guaranteed, but the Government should also guarantee the principal.

For all practical purposes this is a Government enterprise. While the corporation that is established is outside of the actual jurisdiction of the Government itself with reference to fiscal appropriations, nevertheless it is for all practical purposes a governmental agency and has as its objective benefits for the general welfare of a large group of our people.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] mentioned a remark made during the last session, in an elevator, which remark he overheard in the old House Office Building, coming from a Member who represented an industrial district. I want to suggest to the gentleman that such is not the prevailing sentiment among the Members of this body who represent industrial districts.

Mr. GILCHRIST. If the gentleman will permit, I freely grant that and I am pleased to have the opportunity of saying so. I did not want the remark to be taken as indicative of the sentiment of the House.

Mr. McCORMACK. Last session, when this bill was under consideration, or, rather, a year prior to that, I made a speech on the farm question. At that time I stated that as a Representative of an industrial district, without a farm in my district, I would vote for the issuance of bonds in the sum of $2,000,000,000 with interest to be charged on farm-mortgage refinancing at 2 or 2½ percent, and the Government to assume the difference between the interest paid by the farmer and the interest that the Government must pay in order to obtain the sale of its bonds.

I made this statement because the impression in my mind is that one of the primary problems of the farmer is the debt question. The farmer is burdened with debt.

So far as taxes are concerned, the farmer's difficulty is not a Federal Government problem; it is a State or county or local problem. But the farmer, in addition to his local-tax problem, has the problem of debt—a tremendous debt burden imposed upon him during the years of the war and immediately succeeding the war and, in part, brought about by the very suggestion of the Federal Government itself. One of the Members has made a reference to this and I thoroughly agree with him in his statement.

There is one further suggestion I want to make. The farmer's income must be increased. I realize, as we all do, that the law of supply and demand operates with reference to the farmer just the same as it operates with reference to any other field of activity. However, under the N.R.A., marketing agreements are provided for, and as a result of the passage of the N.R.A. certain marketing agreements have been entered into. I shall refer to one that I am somewhat conversant with, relating to the marketing agreement affecting milk and cream in the Boston area.

I am in receipt of a communication from the director of necessaries of life of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts in response to a telegram that I sent him a few days ago, showing that the farmers receive a net income per quart of milk of 3½ cents.

I am also advised that as a result of the provision made with reference to the disposition of surplus milk, the net amount brought to him would be around the above figure.

I am also advised by the commissioner of agriculture of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that in order for a farmer to produce a quart of milk and obtain a bare living in Massachusetts he must obtain 5.35 cents per quart.

This is a matter that should be looked into and investigated and the new marketing agreement that is going to be entered into should be made with due regard to the producer as well as the consumer. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. HEALEY.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I am going to support this legislation, whose principal purpose is the guarantee of $2,000,000,000 worth of bonds, both as to principal and interest, by the United States, these bonds to be issued by the corporation whose organization is provided for under the terms of the bill to be known as the "Farm Mortgage Corporation."

The Emergency Farm Mortgage Act was passed at the last session of this Congress to assist the distressed farmers of the Nation who were unable to obtain loans from life-insurance companies, mortgage-loan companies, banks, and trust companies which, in normal times, carried the farmers' mortgage indebtedness, because they had ceased making loans due to the appalling financial situation which obtained in March last.

That was inspired, wise, and humane legislation, designed to preserve the very foundations upon which our national, economic, and social structure is erected. And if it is necessary to pass further legislation, supplementing that legislation and insuring its full effectiveness, I am strongly behind it.

However, it was realized during the last session of Congress that, in the urban communities, the farmer had his counterpart in the small home owner. In the urban districts he represents the solid, stable foundation upon which our urban economic and social structure is founded. The distess of that class of citizens must also, eventually, mean the disaster of the Nation as a whole. And it was found not only logically consistent with the farm relief bill but logically necessary to it that legislation should be passed to relieve the dire distress of the small home owner and alleviate his condition, to the end that the bases of our city structure should continue to endure. Although the practical aspects of these great programs of reconstruction and rehabilitation required that they should be handled separately. The fundamental policy and the underlying objectives of both of these bills were identical—to safeguard that class of citizens which forms the foundation of our economic, social, and national life—the home owner—to the end that the welfare of our Nation as a whole may be served.

And now, again, although the practical aspects of the problem require that the farmer and the urban home owner be treated apart, it is a practical and logical necessity that such legislation as is taken to safeguard and assure that past legislation which was designed to extend relief to the farmer must also be extended to perform the same function for that legislation which we passed to alleviate the distress of the small home owner.

The condition of the farmers and agriculture was more desperate on March last than perhaps at any other time in our history. The condition of the home owner approximated a major crisis. Swiftly, we did our utmost to extend relief to both of these classes by enacting relief legislation for them. But we have since found that, in both of these cases, the legislation passed did not suffice to assure the most successful operation of the relief sought. This was due, in the main, to the fact that the principal of the bonds to be exchanged for outstanding mortgages was not guaranteed and there was a wholesale refusal, on the part of mortgage holders, to accept these bonds. It is now proposed to guarantee the principal on these bonds and thus remove the only objection which mortgage holders can validly set up to the conversion of their mortgages for the bonds. I am heartily in accord with this legislation. However, I feel that, consistently, we must follow this legislation with legislation which will perform the same function for the distressed home owners throughout the land, and I am here to plead that this legislation be swiftly enacted and that it be immediately followed by legislation which will result in the guarantee of bonds issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation. It would be not only inconsistent and illogical to do the one without the other, it would also be unjust and discriminatory to extend relief to the one and not to the other; both are in dire distress.

But even when we have passed this legislation, and like legislation for the home owner, it may be that we shall not have fully remedied the situation. The guaranteeing of the principal of these bonds should remove any valid reason for the nonacceptance by the mortgage holders of bonds in return for their mortgages. There may still be those mortgagees who will refuse to accept bonds yielding only 4 percent instead of the 6 percent or higher percentage of interest provided by their mortgage instruments and it may well be pointed out that, even by the guaranteeing of the principal of these bonds we shall not remedy this situation.

But it strikes me that the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Minnesota case may point the way for the enactment, by the several States, of legislation which would allow to the distressed home owner, in danger of losing his home or farm by foreclosure, an appeal to the courts for an injunction against such foreclosure proceedings by the mortgagee and would grant to the courts the power, if it was found that the case was one of true distress and further that the mortgagee had refused to accept bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation or the Home Owners' Loan Corporation in exchange for his mortgage, to issue such an injunction restraining the mortgagee from such foreclosure proceedings for such period of time as may be deemed equitable and just.

In view of the above-mentioned decision of the Supreme Court, it appears to me that such legislation would fall clearly within the language of that decision because the condition of distressed home owners throughout this land does present an emergency and the sanctity of contracts can no longer be held so sacred as to interfere with the safeguarding of the economic structure upon which the good of all depends. Surely the common good of our country depends upon the preservation of the family unit in the city and on the farm—those units which have their highest and most beneficial development in the homes, rural and urban, of our country. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself the remainder of the time on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 12 minutes.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, the only question here is whether we are going to make effective the bill that we passed at the special session providing for farm loans in the amount of $2,000,000,000. You will recollect that in that bill there was authorized to be issued Federal land-bank bonds in an amount not to exceed $2,000,000,000, and there was also appropriated $200,000,000 to be used by the Land Bank Commissioner in making emergency loans, most of which it was expected would be based on second mortgages.

Up until the 10th of January last, $250,000,000 had been paid out on Federal land-bank and Land Bank Commissioner loans. Of the amount loaned up to January 1, $140,000,000 had been Federal land-bank loans and $80,000,000 Land Bank Commissioner loans.

At the time the legislation was passed last spring it was anticipated that it would be possible to exchange Federal land-bank bonds for farm mortgages and that mortgage holders generally would be willing to accept bonds for the mortgages. It was anticipated that they could sell these bonds on the market. It has not been possible to do either. Up to the present time there has been issued under the provisions of the act $150,000,000 in bonds, and all of them are being held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. None of them have been offered to the public and none are in the hands of the public at the present time.

Every effort has been made to induce insurance companies and mortgage companies to take the bonds, but so far without success. I think it is very obvious to anyone that with the Federal financing which we are going to have within the next few months and the state of the bond market generally it will be utterly impossible to sell any of these bonds authorized last spring on the open market. Therefore, if the Farm Credit Corporation is going to carry out the task Congress gave it last spring, it is essential that the bonds be guaranteed both as to principal and interest in order to make them salable.

In addition to the money paid out on loans on January 1, there were applications which had been allowed but not paid, amounting to $655,000,000. There is no money available today for closing these loans. The only possibility of closing them is to pass this measure providing for a guarantee of both principal and interest.

Another important feature of this bill is the provision for $800,000,000, to be available for Land Bank Commissioner loans. This is an increase of $600,000,000.

All of you who have had any experience in this matter are aware of the fact that Land Bank Commissioner loans are the real emergency loans. Under the provisions of the law these loans may be made up to 75 percent of the value of the land and may be secured by second mortgages. So that under this act there is set aside, out of the $2,200,000,000, which is available, a total of $800,000,000 for Commissioner loans.

The bonds which are to be issued under the provisions of this act will bear such a rate of interest as is necessary to enable them to be sold at par. That rate will certainly be no higher than the 4 percent which was authorized in the act of last spring, and it may be less. We have the assurance of the Farm Credit Administration that any decrease in the rate of interest which it is necessary to pay will accrue to the farmer in the way of a lower rate to him.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that we should enact that into legislation so that we may be assured that the farmer will have a decrease in his interest rate?

Is not that the trouble with the farmer today? His interest rate is too high, making his overhead so high that the farm products at the price now received for them will not pay any profit on his farm after paying the overhead expense?

Mr. HOPE. I agree with the gentleman that there is no question that the high rate of interest which the farmer has been paying, and is paying at the present time, is one of the causes of the distress in which he finds himself, and certainly everything possible should be done to secure lower rates of interest.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. ARENS. Why should $200,000,000 be loaned by the Commissioner on a basis of 75 percent of the valuation, when $1,800,000,000 of it is to be loaned only on 60 percent of the normal value of the property?

Mr. HOPE. I am afraid the gentleman misunderstood me, because one of the advantages which will accrue from the passage of this bill is that there will be $800,000,000, instead of $200,000,000, available for loans upon the basis of 75 percent of the value of the land. In other words, there will be an additional fund of $600,000,000 available for such loans if we pass this bill.

As I remarked in the beginning, Mr. Chairman, the only question that is before the House at this time is whether we will make effective the provisions of the act which we passed last spring. This measure is not all that many of us desire, perhaps. There are a great many different ideas among the Members of this House as to just what legislation should be passed for the relief of agriculture, but every Member of the House can vote for this measure with the assurance that it will better the condition of the farmers in his district. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALLGOOD] such time as he may desire.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the Committee on Agriculture for its quick action in reporting this important agricultural bill to the House. I wish also to commend the membership of the House, which is practically unanimous in its support of this measure. This bill, in the main, is in keeping with the policies of President Roosevelt and will help bring more relief to the mortgaged farmers of our Nation. I cannot help thinking of the difference in leadership for farm relief between President Roosevelt and Mr. Hoover. Mr. Hoover never seemed to be able to visualize legislation which would benefit agriculture. President Roosevelt does have a grasp of its condition and of its seriousness, and he makes his wishes known in messages that we can understand; and he asks for immediate action because he realizes, as we Members of Congress realize, that the people need relief and not oratory and long-drawn-out discussions in speech making.

The Committee on Agriculture only held 2 days' hearings on this bill, and we are going to pass it here in the House in 1 day. The bill that we passed at the extra session of Congress did good. It helped restore confidence among the farmers, and this bill will give untold relief to thousands of farmers throughout the land if it properly administered.

There are some provisions in the bill which I personally would change, but legislation is a question of compromise, and just because I cannot get everything that I desire in this measure I am not going to vote against the measure. I do not like the principle of tax exemptions, and I would vote for a general measure against granting tax exemptions. The tax-exemption feature of this bill will cause these securities to sell at a low rate of interest. This, of course, will help the farmers who are in danger of losing their homes under foreclosures. While opposed to the principle of tax-exempt securities, yet I do not want to begin with the farmers and leave industrial and other securities tax exempt and, therefore, make the farmer pay a higher rate of interest. The provisions of this bill will help restore farm values through the Nation, and we will never have general prosperity again until there is a demand and sale for farm homes. I am also in favor of the Government guaranteeing the home-loan bonds so as to enable the Home Owners' Loan Corporation to function.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to just one or two things. Of course, we may talk about interest rates at any point we desire, but the fact remains that before the land banks were established most of the farmers in the West and South were paying 10-percent interest on loans on their farms, and that in many instances was compounded. All through the Nation they were paying 7 to 8 percent. Not until the Federal land bank was established were the mortgage companies, the insurance companies induced to reduce their rates. The present emergency act, the one in effect now, passed last spring, provided for a further reduction in interest to 4½ percent on the land-bank loans and 5 percent on the Commissioner loans. One would think, to hear some of these gentlemen talk—and I am very fond of some of them—that the Government is doing the farmers a wrong in reducing those rates of interest. I say that it is doing the farmers a great favor. Perhaps it does not go as far as some of us would like, but I would rather have a part of something than all of nothing. These gentlemen have been talking about things that ought to be done but which have no chance of being done. We have in the White House now for the first time in a long while a man who has a sympathy with and an understanding of the problems of agriculture. He has recommended a method of refinancing farm mortgages. We are providing, in accordance with the program that has been worked out, legislation that will reduce the rate of interest. The President also, as disclosed by his message yesterday, is providing for an expansion and liberalizing of the currency. Do not you gentlemen ever find anybody that you can go along with? Do you have to have everything just exactly as you want it all the time? In the 16 years that I have served in the House I have voted for just one general measure that was exactly as I wanted it; and that was a little bill about that long [indicating], which I wrote myself and which, through some process of legerdemain, I got through the House without amendment. The bill went to the Senate. The Senate looked it over forward and back and then struck out all after the enactment clause and inserted a new bill. The bill went to conference, and the conference committee wrote a bill different from either the House or the Senate bill.

The men who stand on this floor and damn the man who has done something for the farmer and condemn everything that is offered because it is not offered in the form they want it are doing the farmer no service. I have heard for a generation people talk about doing something for the farmer. This is the first administration in a long time that has actually done something for the farmer; and one would think, to hear these gentlemen, that the administration is abusing them. It is possible for the people who represent industrial districts to lose sympathy with the agricultural interests.

There are only 30 percent of us. For one time, both the Democrats and Republicans in this House have shown a sympathy for the problems of agriculture.

I think this bill is going a long way to relieve the situation, and the farmers evidently think so, because they have applied for $2,100,000,000 of refinancing in less than 8 months. Does that look like they were condemning it? It does not seem so to me. It so happens that of the loans actually made, the largest number were in the district in which the State of Iowa is located, and the second largest number were in the district in which Minnesota and Wisconsin are located. While, of course, it took some little time to get a great organization of this kind functioning, they have put out $250,000,000 already, and they have about eight times that much applied for. I will wager that the farmers in those States I mentioned have asked for their pro rata part of the remaining fund. If you want to know, I will check up on that.

This may not be all that we would all like to have; but I want to tell you that, from the reports I get from all over the Union, much is being done for the relief of agriculture and for the saving of American farm homes. If you would rather "gum the cards" and get nothing out of this, it is your privilege to say, "Oh, I wanted to give the farmer more than this, but I could not do it." Of course, somebody else could come along and say, "I offered to give it to them without interest." Then somebody would offer them a bonus to take it. We have to stay on practical ground. This is a practical bill, and I assure, I believe if it is passed great work will be done in financing American farms. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate having expired, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, hereinafter in this act referred to as the "Governor", is authorized to organize and charter a corporation to be known as the "Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation", hereinafter in this act referred to as the "corporation." The board of directors of such corporation shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, or an officer of the Treasury designated by him, the Governor, the Land Bank Commissioner, and two officers of the Farm Credit Administration to be designated by the Governor. The terms of the directors designated by the Governor shall be for a period of 12 months commencing January 1 of each year, but the terms of the directors first designated shall be for the balance of the 12 months' period commencing January 1, 1934, but a director appointed to fill a vacancy shall hold his office for the unexpired term of the director whose place he is selected to fill. Any director designated by the Governor may at any time be removed by him for cause. The directors shall receive no additional compensation for their services as directors of the corporation, but may be allowed actual necessary traveling and subsistence expenses when engaged in the business of the corporation outside of the District of Columbia. The Governor shall be the chairman of the board of directors. The directors shall have power to adopt such bylaws and amendments to the charter of the corporation as they deem necessary for the conduct of the business of the corporation. The directors shall have power, without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to the employment and compensation of officers and employees of the United States, to employ and fix the compensation of such agents, officers, and employees of the corporation as may be necessary to carry out the powers and duties conferred upon the corporation, and to prescribe the manner in which the obligations of the corporation shall be incurred and its expenses allowed and paid.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 2, after the word "paid", insert "but the rate of compensation of officers and employees of the corporation shall be subject to the limitation contained in section 66 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES. Is this the Frazier bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. It is.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] be considered as read, and printed in the RECORD. I think most everyone is familiar with it. If that is permitted, then I wish to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES]?

Mr. BOILEAU. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object if I have a moment to explain what the amendment is. The amendment provides that all of section 1 shall be stricken from the bill, and the Frazier bill, with which the Members are all familiar, be substituted in its place. In the event there should be an unfavorable ruling on the point of order which will be made by the gentleman from Texas, and there should be a favorable vote on this amendment, I would then, of course, move to strike out each of the succeeding sections of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOILEAU: Page 1, line 3, beginning with line 3, on page 1, strike out all of section 1 down to and including line 2 on page 3, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"That this act shall be known by the title 'The Farmers' Farm Relief Act.'

"SEC. 2. That the Government now perform its solemn promise and duty and place American agriculture on a basis of equality with other industries by providing an adequate system of credit, through which farm indebtedness and farm mortgages now existing may be liquidated and refinanced, through real-estate mortgages on the amortization plan, at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal per annum, and through mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes at 3-percent interest per annum through the use of the machinery of the Federal farm-loan system and the Federal Reserve Banking System.

"SEC. 3. The Federal Farm Loan Board is hereby authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making real-estate loans, secured by first mortgages on farms, to an amount equal to the fair value of such farms and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, through the use of the machinery of the Federal land banks and national farm-loan associations, and to make all necessary rules and regulations for the carrying out of the purposes of this act with expedition. In case such farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness to be liquidated and refinanced exceeds the fair value of any farm and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, then such farm mortgages and indebtedness shall be scaled down in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. Such loans shall be made at a rate of 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal per annum, payable in any lawful money of the United States.

"SEC. 4. The Federal Farm Loan Board is further authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up chattel mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making loans at the rate 3-percent interest per annum, secured by first mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes, to an amount equal to 65 percent of the fair market value thereof, such loans to run for a period of 1 year, with right of renewal from year to year for a term of 10 years: Provided, That any depreciation in the value of such livestock is replaced by additional livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes, and the amount of the loan is reduced to 10 percent each year.

"SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, $100,000 for the use of the Federal Farm Loan Board to carry out the provisions of this act. The necessary and actual expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions in this act shall be apportioned and prorated and added to each individual mortgage and such sums so added shall be paid to the Federal Farm Loan Board for administrative purposes.

"SEC. 6. The funds with which to liquidate and refinance existing farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness shall be provided by the issuing of farm-loan bonds by the Federal farm-loan system, through the Federal Farm Loan Board and Federal land banks, as now provided by law, which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 1½ percent per annum, if secured by mortgages on farms, and 3 percent per annum if secured by chattel mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes. These bonds, after delivery to the Federal Farm Loan Board, may, by it, be sold at par to any individual or corporation, or to any State, National, or Federal Reserve bank, or to the Treasurer of the United States. And it shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve banks to invest their available surplus and net profits, after the dividends are paid to their stockholders, in such farm-loan bonds. Such profits to include the franchise tax now paid to the United States.

"SEC. 7. In case all of said farm-loan bonds are not readily purchased, then the Federal Farm Loan Board shall present the remainder to the Federal Reserve Board, and the Board shall forthwith cause to be issued and delivered to the Federal Farm Loan Board Federal Reserve notes to an amount equal to the par value of such bonds as are presented to it. Such farm-loan bonds to be held by the Federal Reserve Board as security in lieu of any other security or reserve.

"SEC. 8. The Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal land banks shall turn over all payments of interest and principal on such farm-loan bonds, for which the Federal Reserve Board issues Federal Reserve notes, to the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be by him kept for the purpose of redeeming said Federal Reserve notes and reinvested by him as a sinking fund in municipal or State bonds and bearing interest at the rate of at least 2 percent per annum, both principal and interest to be paid in any lawful money of the United States.

"SEC. 9. Wherever the amount of money actually in circulation in the United States shall exceed $75 per capita, then the Treasurer of the United States, by and with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board and the President of the United States, may retire Federal Reserve notes in an amount equal to the principal paid on farm-loan bonds, for which Federal Reserve notes were issued, not to exceed 2 percent in any 1 year, of the amount of Federal Reserve notes so issued.

"SEC. 10. There is hereby created a Board of Agriculture consisting of one member from each State, elected by the farmers of such State, who shall be elected by delegates selected by a mass convention of farmers in each county or parish within the United States, who are indebted and declare it to be their intention to take advantage of this act, such county or parish convention to be its own judge as to who are bona fide farmers and otherwise eligible to participate in its proceedings.

"SEC. 11. The Federal Farm Loan Board is hereby authorized and directed to give public notice, through the Federal land banks, to the farmers of each county or parish of the time and place of holding the first county or parish convention, which shall be held at the seat of government of each county or parish; and it shall at the same time give notice of the first convention of the State delegates, to be held at the State capital of each State, notice of such convention to be given within 60 days after the enactment of this act.

"SEC. 12. The farmers attending such county or parish convention and the State delegates attending such State convention shall organize and make such rules and regulations for their procedure as they deem necessary or convenient, and shall elect a president and a secretary and make arrangements for such other and future conventions as they may deem necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, and they shall at all times cooperate and assist the Board of Agriculture, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the Federal land banks, and national farm-loan associations to liquidate and refinance farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

"SEC. 13. The State delegates so elected shall meet at the State capitals of their respective States and elect a member of the Board of Agriculture, who shall hold his office from the date of such election and for a period of 2 years from January 20 following, and who shall receive $15 per diem and necessary traveling expenses while on official business, to be paid by the Federal Farm Loan Board out of any funds set apart by section 5 of this act.

"SEC. 14. Immediately after their election the members of the Board of Agriculture, upon call of the Federal Farm Loan Board, shall meet at Washington, in the District of Columbia, and organize by electing a chairman and a secretary, and they shall make such rules and regulations as they deem necessary and expedient to carry out the purposes of this act. They shall elect an executive committee of three, none of whom shall be members of the Board of Agriculture, who shall hold their office at the will of said board, and who shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum, and 5 cents per mile for necessary traveling expenses while on official business, to be paid by the Federal Farm Loan Board out of any funds set apart by section 5 of this act.

"SEC. 15. The members of the Board of Agriculture shall keep in touch with and report to the executive committee the progress of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness in their respective States. They shall cooperate with county or parish and State governments, and with all farm and cooperative organizations within their respective States, to speedily bring about the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

"SEC. 16. The executive committee of the Board of Agriculture shall advise with and supervise the work of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness by the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal Reserve Board, and they shall cooperate with said boards and with county or parish and State governments and with the various farm organizations, and with the agricultural colleges of the Nation, in order to bring about a just and speedy liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness. They shall report any member of the farm-loan system or the Federal Reserve Board who neglects, hinders, or delays the carrying out of the provisions of this act to the President of the United States, and it shall be the duty of the President, upon cause shown, to remove any such officer and to appoint some other suitable person in his place with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"SEC. 17. The benefits of this act shall also extend to any farmer, or member of his family, who lost his farm through indebtedness or mortgage foreclosure since 1919 and who desires to purchase the farm lost or another farm. It shall also extend to any tenant, or member of his family, who desires to purchase a farm, provided he has lived on and operated a farm as a tenant for at least 3 years prior to the enactment of this act.

"SEC. 18. The executive committee of the Board of Agriculture shall have power in case of crop failures, and in other meritorious cases, to extend the time payments due on loans made under this act from time to time for a period not exceeding 3 years, provided the mortgagor keeps up the payment of all taxes on the mortgaged property.

"SEC. 19. This act shall be liberally construed, and no technicalities or limitations shall be imposed or permitted to interfere with the speedy carrying out of its purposes; and the provisions of the Federal farm-loan system and the Federal Reserve Banking System shall apply as far as applicable in the carrying out of the provisions of this act; and all laws or parts of laws in conflict herewith are for the purpose of this act repealed. The persons charged with the duty of carrying out the provisions of this act are authorized and directed to do all things necessary or convenient to accomplish its purposes with expedition."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I regret the necessity of making a point of order. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane. It provides an entirely different method of financing, wholly aside from the purport of this measure. It provides for the issuance of currency, which is not involved in the present measure, and it is exactly the same bill as was ruled out of order at the last session. Therefore, I do not consider it necessary to argue the matter further.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I believe this comes under the well-established rule that a general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. As the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has stated, this is the same amendment that was ruled out on a point of order at the last session. I wish to say, however, that the point which I wish to stress to the Chair did not receive a ruling from the Speaker during the previous session. I made the specific point then, as I make now, that a general subject may be amended by specific propositions of the same class, and that therefore this amendment cannot be ruled out on the point of germaneness. The distinguished Speaker at that time did not, in his opinion, refer to the particular point that I raised. Possibly the present Chairman may feel that the point is not deserving of consideration. I feel, however, that the well-established rules of the House are such that at least, in my opinion, this amendment should not be ruled out on the point of germaneness.

The present bill provides for two separate and distinct methods of refinancing agricultural indebtedness. It provides, first of all, for a provision with reference to the Federal land banks and the creation of the Farm Mortgage Corporation to refinance farm mortgage indebtedness. There is a separate and distinct method provided, however, in this bill for accomplishing the same purpose; that is, the refinancing of agricultural indebtedness. There is a provision that provides for $800,000,000 to be made available to the Federal Land Bank Commissioner, for so-called "Commissioner" loans. Therefore the present bill provides two separate and distinct methods of refinancing farm mortgage indebtedness, and under the rule I have already referred to, I believe this third method can properly be considered as an amendment either as an additional method or as a substitute for the other two, under the very many precedents already established in the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GREENWOOD). The Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Wisconsin offers the Lemke bill as an amendment, in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill.

The Lemke bill offered as an amendment orders that the Federal Farm Board be authorized to make loans direct to farm borrowers, both upon real-estate mortgages, chattel mortgages, and on livestock, with the right to renew these chattel mortgages from year to year. The Federal Farm Board is allowed to exchange these mortgage securities with the Treasurer of the United States for Federal Reserve notes using repayments of these mortgages to retire these notes. This issue of currency by the Treasury is contingent upon a per capita circulation. This is rather an elaborate system of inflation based upon the farm indebtedness and contemplates many things not proposed in the pending bill.

The pending bill proposes to guarantee the principal and interest of bonds issued upon real-estate mortgages made by the Federal land banks and intermediate credit banks. It also provides certain tax-exemptions for these bonds. These provisions are intended to stabilize the price and provide a better market for these bonds of the Federal land banks and the intermediate credit banks.

The corporation set up in the pending bill is in the nature of a holding corporation to stabilize and improve the value and security of the real-estate bonds issued by the Federal farm-loan agencies to carry out the purposes of the former Farm Loan Act.

The pending bill deals with bonds while the Lemke bill, which is offered as an amendment, provides for loans direct to borrowers and provides for an extensive issue of Treasury notes that will greatly inflate the currency. However commendable this may be, it is in nature a decidedly different subject matter than the pending bill. This question came up in the last session of Congress, April 13, 1933, and was ruled upon by Mr. Speaker RAINEY. I quote only a part of his ruling:

The Chair feels he cannot ignore the precedents that he has cited, and he might add that he could call attention to a number of others. The Chair wants it distinctly understood that he is not passing upon the propriety of inflating the currency. That is another question. If the currency is to be inflated by printing and distributing money in any way, it should be the subject of a separate bill, considered by a committee, reported to the House, and considered on the floor in the ordinary way.

We have here, then, two different types of farm relief, one dealing with inflation of the currency, the other with stabilization of the bonds of agencies that are already set up for farm-loan purposes. On the basis of the decision the Chair has just quoted and the comments the Chair has made, the Chair is of the opinion the amendment offered is not germane to the pending bill. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The corporation shall have succession until dissolved by act of Congress; shall have power to sue and be sued in any court, to adopt and use a corporate seal, to make contracts, and to acquire, hold, and dispose of real and personal property necessary and incident to the conduct of its business; and shall have such other powers necessary and incident to carrying out its powers and duties under this or any other act of Congress as may be provided by law or in its charter and bylaws or in any amendments thereto. The corporation shall be entitled to the free use of the United States mails in the same manner as the executive departments of the Government. The corporation, with the consent of any board, commission, independent establishment, or executive department of the Government, may avail itself of the use of information, services, facilities, officers, agents, and employees thereof in carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the problem of refinancing farm mortgages is one with which Congress has been trying to deal for a long time. Many of us in this House have for years been urging upon the attention of the country the great evil resulting from the loss of homes by farmers through foreclosures. At the last session we passed a bill to refinance farmers' homes, and also a bill to refinance city owners in their homes. We expressed our opinion as to what ought to be done; but the trouble with the situation is that those who administer the law do not seem to grasp the importance of the intention of Congress. The heads of many farm-land banks are reluctant to grant these loans.

In Oklahoma we found that a lot of appraisers who were sent to appraise farm lands either had glasses on through which they could not see, or who did not know good land when they did see it, because they put such a ridiculous appraisal on it that there is no hope of the farmer getting any relief. The agents of the Government should realize that Congress is dead in earnest about this relief; and we ought not to tolerate a proposition where they submit appraisals which just lack a few hundred dollars of letting the farmer have enough money to pull him out of his difficulties. They might just as well turn down his loan in the first place, because he could not raise the small balance necessary. Yet they say that they are approving and they know that the loan cannot be accepted.

It is all foolishness to appropriate money unless there is to be some sympathetic administration of the law. Because my country is undeveloped, because it has not the magnificent homes seen in other States, because the people there have not been landowners long enough to have fine homes the appraisers say the land is worth $10 an acre. Why, we have had appraisers down in my county who did not know what normal value meant; they have appraised good productive land at $8 or $10 an acre. Some of these agencies are not in sympathy with the Administration and deliberately checkmate the program in order to cause dissatisfaction far in the interior. Farmer after farmer has had his loan application turned down because they would not give him a sufficient appraisal.

I do not want the Government of the United States to lose money and go out and buy a lot of farms. I am the last man in the House who would want to see such a thing occur; but I do say that the farmer is entitled to a fair appraisal of his lands. These appraisers should be picked and chosen because of a thorough knowledge of land values; they should be men who are unprejudiced and unbiased, men who know their business.

I do not know what has been the experience of the other Members in the matter of farm loans, but I believe the time has come when we should have some liberality shown, because when the time comes that the farm homes of this country are destroyed, when the homes are taken away from the men in the city, an element of our citizenship will be turned loose with nothing to hold them to their country. I believe that in this country every man ought to be a home owner. I believe every industrial worker in the great cities ought at least to have some home that ties him to the soil of his country. I am a strong believer in home ownership, and I think it should be encouraged by preventing the foreclosures of these mortgages. The cheapening of the dollar will result in the mortgagees looking over the situation, and if there is any equity they are going to foreclose despite the fact they are offered bonds of real value in exchange for their mortgages.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

I intend to support this bill for the reason that it is the best proposition that we have offered to assist the farmers and their mortgage troubles at this time. But the trouble is, this bill does not go far enough, and does not give the relief demanded or the relief that Congress intends to give the farmer. I believe the Government should either get into the mortgage business or out of the mortgage business, and for the reason just stated that this bill does not go far enough, and for the further reason I am in favor of giving the farmer the real relief needed, and in favor of restoring prosperity to agriculture, I am supporting the Frazier bill, with its lower rates of interest. In fact I have promised my farmers to support it.

I have had more trouble with this farm-mortgage proposition under the present set-up this past year than all of the veterans' claims and those asking for jobs, and why shouldn't I, with Congress passing a bill to help the farmer in this emergency and with the Administration over the radio telling the farmer to come in and get it, and then finding 96.38 percent being turned down upon their applications for one reason or another, after having paid an application fee of $11, which I want to tell you was hard to dig up out in my district this summer?

I am in the ninth Federal land-bank district, which comprises the States of Kansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, and New Mexico, where thousands of applications were going in a week, and all during these summer months where we had thought the land bank was closing mortgages by the hundreds it was discovered that only about 45 loans a month were being made by our bank to all four States.

I knew the letters that my farmer applicants would get by heart. The first paragraph would tell them their applications had been approved from one third to one half less than was applied for last spring. In addition to that so much would be deducted for stock, leaving them about one third short of what they owed on their first mortgage, to say nothing of all their other indebtedness and perhaps a second mortgage. They were then told they must make up this difference in cash. Every time the farmer would say to me, "If I could make up this difference in cash, why would I be asking for a loan?" This theory of scaling down and taking out stock sounds very nice here in Washington and in the committee rooms, but it is a different proposition when you are confronted with the situation out in our country and trying to explain to the farmer out on the farm how he is being benefited by it. This proposition of a borrower having to subscribe so much stock has always been too deep for me. My experience has always been when a bank began to loan to its stockholders that it was not long, even in the days of prosperity, before that bank went on the rocks. As a Member of Congress, and I believe the other Members of Congress view this whole measure as an emergency act, with such fine-spun theory wound about this institution, which I have discovered is mostly red tape, and might work out all right in prosperous times where the borrower may choose from where he wishes to obtain his loan from many sources, but I wish to say it does not work out from a practical standpoint. Another thing, I do not appreciate agents of a Federal land bank writing me and telling me what the intent of Congress was concerning farm relief, as has been done in my case, to which I replied I thought I was in a better position to state what the intent of Congress was than some Federal employee.

Mention has been made of the harsh contracts that the Government compels the farmers to sign. In my State, if I take cattle to pasture, the State law gives me a lien on them for the pasture rent, yet the Government, through the Regional Agriculture Credit Corporation, has been following a sharp practice of ingeniously slipping into the contracts waiver of pasture rent, wherein a great number of my constituents in leasing pastures and employing men to take care of cattle that were mortgaged to the Regional Agriculture Credit Corporation, in which the cattle through their efforts have put on an average of three or four hundred pounds per head, wake up and find the Government taking the cattle away from them and refusing to reimburse them for even the expenses they have been to in leasing the pasture and taking care of the cattle, not to say anything about profit in the transaction.

In one case I know of a man in this situation produced 360,000 pounds of beef for the Government; for this production he is obligated to pay a pasture bill of over $4,000 and other expenses amounting to $1,000, being the work of himself and boys in caring for these cattle during the summer season. The Government is taking all the profits and leaving the man to pay the expenses necessary for the production of this beef for the Government.

I wrote letters to 125 secretary-treasurers of the Farm Credit Association in my State and received replies from 85 and figures from 83 of them showing the condition up to November 1, and I discovered there had been 8,145 applications for loans, and of this 8,145, only 295 had been closed. Since that time there has been a shake-up in this bank and more favorable reports are coming to me, but again I say the present set-up does not go far enough. We cannot by any stretch of the imagination take care of $9,000,000,000 worth of farm mortgages with $2,000,000,000, and let us cease in this Congress to make agriculture a political football. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Early this afternoon I made reference to a letter which I had received from the Director of the Division on the Necessaries of Life of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, relating to the milk and cream situation in the Boston area. I assume that similar situations or conditions exist in other industrial areas throughout the country; therefore I am going to read a portion of this letter, because if what this very fine public official says is correct, it is conclusive evidence that the large home-delivery distributors, backed by the International Milk Dealers' Association, are engaged in a program of eliminating milk sales from stores and at the same time are seeking to gouge both the consumer and the farmer. If what this official says is true, it is an interesting piece of evidence. It should be known to those who are about to make a new marketing agreement in the A.A.A. as a result of the provisions of the N.I.R.A. I understand that the present marketing agreement will expire on January 19 and that a new marketing agreement is now under consideration.

If what this distinguished and responsible gentleman says is correct, or if any part of it is correct, it is the duty of the Federal officials of the A.A.A., or those who are responsible for approving the marketing agreement, to see that the consumers and the farmers throughout the United States are protected in connection with any new marketing agreements that might be entered into. This letter reads in part as follows:

I am very happy to comply with the request made by you in your telegram of January 11, asking for information concerning the milk and cream situation in Massachusetts. It would take a 5-ton truck to send on all the information available, so I am going to suggest that you ask the Dairy Division of the A.A.A. to furnish you with the briefs presented by Consolidated Dairies, H. P. Hood & Sons, Whiting Milk Co., Bellows Falls Dairy, and Charles F. Adams, of First National Stores. Aside from this data, I will attempt to briefly provide an analysis of conditions here resulting from price fixation of milk and cream sold at wholesale and retail.

As you know the purpose of the A.A.A. is to restore or bring up prices to the farmer somewhere near those received during the period 1909–14. For this purpose processing taxes have been promulgated in addition to which milk-marketing agreements have been put out in certain areas.

It is my contention, backed up by personal observation of conditions existing in the Dairy Division under the former direction of Dr. Clyde L. King, that the dominating elements who participated in writing the present marketing agreement covering the New England milk shed which serves the Boston market are the large home-delivery distributors who are backed up by the International Milk Dealers Association on a program to eliminate milk sales from the stores. In fact, I was told in this division on the occasion of one of my trips there that they were not interested in operating costs of various companies which I had procured and offered to them for the purpose of comparing costs between home delivery and store merchandising; that they had a program to put through and intended to put it through, said program being the fixation of prices at retail without differential between store and home delivery, it being their contention that by so doing the stores would be wiped out of the milk business.

This is a very serious charge, and, if correct, it is a very, very bad condition to exist or to permit its continued existence.

Continuing, this letter says:

As the milk-marketing agreement stands today, they have accomplished just that, so that instead of increasing farmer earnings, farmer checks are steadily decreasing.

Briefly, the set-up for farmer return is based on 6½ cents per quart of fluid milk, less deductions for hauling, country station charges, New England Milk Producers dues and assessments, and assessments for the cost of administering the Director's office, which bring this net return to approximately 4½ cents. In addition to this, the price paid for surplus milk is based on the price of butter in the Chicago market, which, during the past month, has been at the lowest level for 50 years. Therefore, the farmer return on this surplus milk for the last half of December was 1.6 cents per quart. The surplus is running at approximately 40 percent, so that the net return to the farmer for all milk is less than 3½ cents per quart.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Does the gentleman know that in California we have a similar condition? In other words, the producer receives 35 percent, the distributor 65 percent, and the poor consumer pays the price to the Milk Trust.

Mr. McCORMACK. That shows that similar conditions exist in the State of California to those that exist in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman agree with me that that has been brought about by virtue of the fact that Massachusetts has lodged upon a policy of protecting its own producers by raising virtually a tariff wall which bars the products from other States, under the guise of legislation supposedly in reference to sanitation, health, and matters of that kind? I am not condemning it, but is not that the cause?

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not agree with the gentleman that a wall has been created by Massachusetts. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts imposes certain conditions upon its own dairy producers and naturally insists that those same conditions apply to outsiders.

Mr. KVALE. I agree with the gentleman, but what was supposed to help the producer permits the distributor to use as a weapon against both producer and consumer.

Mr. McCORMACK. As I proceed, my distinguished friend will realize that no matter what his views may be with reference to Massachusetts legislation, and I am in disagreement with him on that, the evidence in this letter shows that those conditions exist without regard to its legislation.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I have 5 minutes more?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this is on another subject. We are trying to finish this afternoon and there are two or three substantial amendments to be considered.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I want 5 more minutes, and then I am through.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. The letter continues:

The resale price of milk has a fixed minimum of 11 cents and a maximum of 12 cents per quart. The minimum price for one half-pint bottle sold to schools and restaurants is 4.5 cents, or 14 cents per quart, on which the farmer nets 4½ cents. This wholesale price has driven the price charged in restaurants to 10 cents, which price has restricted consumption to a minimum and reflected back on farmer return.

The same condition is true of school milk sales, which operate in most instances on a nonprofit basis, the price per half pint being 5 cents usually. Youngsters formerly received a 10-ounce bottle for this price and milk has actually been boycotted by this group either through economic necessity or resentment. Sales of this milk have fallen off two thirds, again reflecting back on farmer return.

I have received many letters from people in your district who have small earnings informing me that, because of their inability to buy milk at stores in the same volume that suits their actual requirements because of fixed prices, they wished to protest against having to pay 11 cents per quart when the store could sell it profitably for 10 cents per quart.

The fixed price for cream is 19 cents minimum and 20 cents maximum per half pint. This is the same cream for which the farmer received 16 cents a quart in December; in other words, the retail price is 80 cents per quart and the farmer return is 16 cents.

In very plain language, it is my contention that farmers were coerced into joining the producer-representative group known as Consolidated Dairies upon the assumption that this group would accomplish definite benefits for them under the A.A.A. This farmer membership resulted in power of attorney to put over a marketing agreement dictated by the large distributors, which was written so that it would accrue to their particular advantage. These large home-delivery distributors saw in what was supposed to be emergency relief for the farmers an opportunity to put over a program that would restore milk sales to them to the detriment of both farmer and consumer alike. They have accomplished what they set out to do.

It is my sincere conviction, after a long study of conditions in Massachusetts, and particularly in the Boston area, that the purpose outlined in the A.A.A. can best be accomplished by the fixing of prices to be paid the farmer on fluid milk, plus the arrangement for payment of surplus milk on its highest marketable value; by the elimination of wholesale and retail price fixation; and by allowing merchandising outlets to get milk into homes at prices more in line with the earning power of the consumer who, after all, has the right to buy this product when and where he pleases.

The farmer protection under this system is based on the fair-practice code of the A.A.A., which prevents the resale of a commodity below cost; President Roosevelt's blanket code under the N.R.A., which prevents the sale of any commodity below cost; and section 8, chapter 93 of the general laws of this Commonwealth, which requires uniformity of prices in communities.

The chaotic conditions in the Boston market prior to the promulgation of the agreement were caused by two of the larger milk companies operating in the Boston area who violated, without prosecution, this law. These firms carried on a campaign of house visitation and selling milk delivered at 10 cents a quart when the announced price was 12 cents a quart; also having prices of 9 cents, 10 cents, 11 cents, and 12 cents for the same commodity in the same locality. This campaign was for the purpose of taking store trade away on the assumption that with price fixation they would retain customers gained in this manner. I can assure you that with the elimination of fixed prices such a condition cannot and will not exist again, as I have the assurance of the attorney general of Massachusetts that he will prosecute any violation in this respect.

It is unfortunate that an intended relief for the farmers of Massachusetts and New England should have been utilized by selfish interests. However, I am confident that you can accomplish much for the people of your district by insisting that price fixation at wholesale and retail be eliminated from the marketing agreement governing this area at once.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. The eight counties of Pennsylvania which I represent are in the New York milk shed and are not under a milk code and have not been under a code. The price in December for milk delivered in New York City was $1.23, with a butter-fat content of 3½ percent. Most of the farmers produce in excess of 4½ percent because of the splendid grazing section.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. THOM. I believe the Department of Agriculture within the last few days has announced that all agreements pertaining to milk will restrict themselves to the price paid the farmer, so that the agreements will no longer cover the retail or wholesale prices.

Mr. McCORMACK. I understand that some such action has been taken.

In conclusion, my purpose has been to show definite evidence from a reliable source of the gouging that has taken place under the marketing agreement, which expires on January 19, of both the consumer and the farmer or the producer in dairy production activities; and in the marketing agreement about to be made those representing the Government should see that the interests of the consumer and the interests of the producer as well as the small-store owner are protected so that the consumer will not pay 80 cents per quart for cream, the producer receive a mere pittance of 16 cents per quart, and the small-store owner denied the right to sell milk and cream. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn and the Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. (a) With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the corporation is authorized to issue bonds in an amount not exceeding in the aggregate $2,000,000,000 at any one time outstanding. Such bonds shall be in such forms and denominations, shall have such maturities, shall bear such rates of interest, shall be subject to such terms and conditions, and shall be issued in such manner and sold at such prices as may be prescribed by the corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and shall, on account of such guaranty, be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security, for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. In the event that the corporation shall be unable to pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the holder the amount thereof which is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and thereupon to the extent of the amount so paid the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any bonds of the corporation issued hereunder, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Loan Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the corporation's bonds hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the bonds of the corporation acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the bonds of the corporations shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. Such bonds shall be fully and adequately secured by such assets of the corporation and in such manner as shall be prescribed by its board of directors. The corporation shall have power to purchase such bonds in the open market at any time and at any price. On such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, the corporation may exchange such bonds, upon application of a Federal land bank issuing bonds after the enactment of this act under the provisions of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, for such farm-loan bonds of equal face value; and may exchange farm-loan bonds held by it for bonds of the corporation of equal face value.

(b) The Corporation is further authorized to purchase from time to time, for cash, consolidated bonds of the 12 Federal land banks issued or to be issued under the provisions of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, at such price and upon such terms as may be approved by the board of directors of the Corporation, and to make loans to Federal land banks on the security of such consolidated bonds.

(c) In order to furnish bonds for delivery by the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to prepare suitable bonds in such form, subject to the provisions of this act, as the board of directors may approve, such bonds when prepared to be held in the Treasury subject to delivery upon order of the Corporation. The engraved plates, dies, bed pieces, and so forth, executed in connection therewith, shall remain in the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Corporation shall reimburse the Secretary of the Treasury for any expenditures made in the preparation, custody, and delivery of such bonds.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 6, line 5, strike out the word "such" and insert in lieu thereof the word "consolidated."

Page 6, line 6, after the word "exchange", insert the word "consolidated."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this bill sponsored by my colleague the Honorable MARVIN JONES, of Amarillo, Tex., is a long step in the right direction of helping the farmers of this country. It is a bill which, when enacted into law, will permit the farmers to use the credit of their Nation in the same way and manner as the banks of the country have been using such credit for more than a century.

HELP ALL HOME OWNERS

I feel that the homes and farms of this country are the best security that anyone can possibly offer. This bill will permit the farmer to use the credit of his Nation to reduce the interest charges that he is now forced to pay upon farm loans. We are hopeful that a similar law will soon be passed to help all home owners—whether city or country.

MORGAN'S PREFERRED LIST

A Federal Reserve bank is a bank for bankers. There is not one penny of stock owned by anyone except the banks. It is all owned by the banking corporations of this country. A few large bankers in New York City largely control the whole System. The Government does not own one penny of stock in the Federal Reserve banks. If you will again examine J. P. Morgan's preferred list you will notice names of directors of Federal Reserve banks on it. Mr. Morgan needed the credit of the Nation in his business and especially when dealing with foreign countries. Naturally he wanted the good will of the directors of the concern that had a right to grant him this valuable privilege. As disclosed by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] in a speech a few days ago, J. P. Morgan persuaded the Federal Reserve Bank of New York to lend England $200,000,000 a few years ago—about 1925. The Nation's credit through the Federal Reserve Bank of New York was extended to England. Our country did not receive a penny's interest on the loan. Neither did the Federal Reserve bank. But J. P. Morgan received from England $1,125,000 for negotiating it. Another time J. P. needed the good will of the directors of that institution, England used that very money to manipulate international exchange against our interest but very much in the interest of Mr. Morgan. When a Federal Reserve bank issues a Federal Reserve note, the Federal Reserve bank does not agree to redeem that note. If you will read a Federal Reserve note you will discover that the credit of this Nation is pledged for the payment of that note. In other words, the Federal Reserve bank that issues it issues a blanket mortgage upon all the homes and all the property of all the people of this Nation, and it is a mortgage upon the incomes of all the people of the Nation until that Federal Reserve note is paid.

A GREAT PRIVILEGE

So the question immediately arises, Should a private corporation have the right to use the credit of this Nation? If at all, should such corporation use such credit free of charge and have a monopoly on its use?

Under existing law the Federal Reserve bank can take $1 of gold and have issued upon that $1 of gold $2.50 in currency and then use that $2.50 in currency to issue $25 of new money; in other words, $10 to every $1 of currency or $25 to every $1 of gold. The difference between the $1 in gold and the $25 is represented not by a metallic reserve, necessarily, but by the credit of this Nation. The homes and all the property of this country are pledged to the payment of these outstanding obligations of that bank.

In this bill the farmers of the country are allowed the same privilege, to save their homes, of using the credit of the Nation as the bankers have been using it for the purpose of issuing money. The farmers will pay for the use of this credit; the bankers do not. It is right for the farmers to pay an interest charge. The bankers should be compelled to pay for the use of this great privilege. The law requires it, but the Federal Reserve Board has failed to carry out the law.

GOOD BILL

This bill does not exactly represent the step I should like to take. I would use the credit of the Nation in a different way; but it is a long step in the right direction, and I see no reason why we should not all be enthusiastic for the passage of this bill.

During the last session of Congress I feel there was more legislation passed to help the farmers, the home owners, the working people, and the poor folk of this country than has ever been passed before in one session of Congress during the existence of the United States. I feel that long steps were taken in the direction we are going today in the passage of this bill.

If I understand this bill right, the farmers will have the use of this credit to reduce their interest, and the interest rate will be not to exceed 4½ percent, except the Commissioners' loans which may be made not to exceed 10 years; the interest rate may be 5 percent. It is possible for the farmers' interest to be reduced to 3 percent or even 2 percent or less under the terms of the law. The farmers and home owners should not be required to pay more for the use of their own Government's credit than others have to pay for its use. We must work to that end.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed with the consideration of the bill, and I hope that any who wish to talk would talk on the bill hereafter and let us try to get through, because we have another bill coming up tomorrow, and I do not want to keep the House in session too late tonight.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 21 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, it is not my theory of government or conception of principle to be observed that it is the proper providence either of State or of the Nation to finance or loan money to the people or to provide a living for the people. It is the providence of the Government to provide fair and tolerable industrial conditions which will afford every man an equal opportunity to finance and provide for himself. But we have gone beyond principle and theory in providing experimental relief measures to bring back prosperity to the people and restoring the buying and consuming power until they can again maintain themselves in business and enterprise. In the measure considered here we are following up the policy first and long observed in Congress of financing and loaning money to banks, to railroads, and insurance companies and other private industrial institutions to maintain their economic status until they have recovered and can sustain themselves.

This bill alone, by itself, will do little more than to prolong the farmers' struggles and to postpone the day of reckoning of farmers' insolvency, bankruptcy, and foreclosure. I am supporting this bill upon this theory and under duress from the economic conditions, and not because it will restore to the farmers a greater debt- or interest-paying power or will enable the farmers finally and ultimately to pay their mortgage debts and save their farm homes. If the Government must guarantee farm mortgages, if it must assume farm obligations, if we must become liable for the farmers' debts, then we should do something worth while to compensate for the liability incurred. If we must insure the principle and interest, as we are doing in this bill; if we must become liable for the mortgage in order for the mortgagees to get their money, let us do something to compensate for the liability we have assumed and take the interest and principle accruing. If we must assume all obligations for the loan, then let us furnish the money ourselves, under like provisions of the Frazier bill, with interest at 1½ percent and principle payments in like amount. Let us furnish the funds under the gold-revaluation plan, the plan we adopt to restore the money supply based upon the increased value of gold which the plan provides for and makes possible and within the limits of money based upon gold.

This form of farm-mortgage relief will incur far less liability than the guarantee of borrowed money with all interest and profits going to the money lenders, because the increased money supply will raise values and the price level and restore the farmers' power to pay, to pay both interest and principal, and save the Government harmless on the bonds. And, incidentally and in the meantime, the rise of values and the price level will restore earnings and income to industry and the general buying and consuming power and bring a restoration of prosperity not alone to the farmers of the country but to all the people as well. If we must make a sacrifice or incur an obligation to save the 40,000,000 farm population, let it not be martyrdom for a trivial cause. Let us save somebody by the sacrifice. Let us save the farm population and incidentally save the whole people from the throes of panic and depression.

But this rudderless course and policy of financing, loaning, and assuming the obligations of all failing and defunct industrial and financial corporations and the same carried now to millions of individuals as well, must come to an end if we would avoid and escape from inevitable national bankruptcy. Private industry must be restored to its former normal status, earnings and income from industry must be brought back to the people, and the debt- and interest-paying power and the buying and consuming power on their own initiative and responsibility restored back to them. [Applause.]

If a remedy is framed on a correct theory, if founded upon a true principle, the cause can be analyzed and explained, the operation can be demonstrated and proven and made clear before men, the relation between the cause and the remedy can be pointed out and shown. It is idle to insist on or urge a remedy for a mysterious or unknown cause. It is folly to direct relief from an evil the cause of which is not understood. It is vain to talk of prosperity always coming just around the corner. The psychologist from France, Coué, who was getting better every day in every way, died while repeating his psychological formula, and thereby trying to persuade himself and others to avoid the inevitable effect of the germs of virulent disease. When the cause of this panic can be explained, when the course of its operations can be traced, when its progress can be followed from beginning through its different stages, a remedy can be provided and applied to arrest its further progress and devastation.

It is the history of this panic or depression that the hard times began with the farmers, came first with the fall of farm values and prices, forcing down and taking away the farmers' earnings and income, destroying the farmers' buying and consuming power. And, finally and ultimately, reaching back through our specialized system of industry, brought unemployment to the laboring masses and destroying the buying and consuming power of men in other trades and callings until all industry was paralyzed, until the panic was made full and complete.

When this panic crisis fell upon the farming industry, with a greater volume of money in circulation and with higher normal prices prevailing, the farmers were selling not more than one fourth of their products, with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and leaving them with the other three fourths or more with which to buy, take, and consume the products of factory, mill, and workshop and with which to pay debts and mortgages and to fulfill their contract obligations. But when money was secretly contracted, beginning and continuing from and after 1920, forcing down values and the price level, the farmers were compelled to sell all, or four fourths, of their crops, stock, and produce with which to pay taxes, interest, and fixed charges, and were left with no part with which to buy and consume, destroying the buying and consuming power of 40,000,000 farm population and dependents.

The farm population not only includes the most numerous class of consumers but a class that buys and consumes double what any other class consumes. The 40,000,000 farm population and dependents not only buy and consume for personal and family use what other classes buy for use in their homes, but as much or more outside of their homes. After buying household supplies for personal and family use, farmers buy many other articles for use in farm equipment and operation and represent as a class by far the greatest buying and consuming power.

The fall of values destroyed the farmer's buying and consuming power and finally this failure and destruction left the retail merchant without demands, the wholesale house without sales, and the factory, mill, and workshop without orders. The wheels of industry slackened and slowed down and brought unemployment to industrial labor and destroyed the buying and consuming power of another thirty million and their dependents. And the fatal circle of hard times, want, suffering, and distress in the midst of plenty and great abundance, was realized and complete.

There is nothing more reasonable, more plausible, logical, and conclusive than, if a withdrawal of money from circulation will cause a fall of values and the price level, bring on a failure of earnings and income and destroy the buying and consuming power, that a restoration of money in circulation will cause a rise of values and the price level, a restoration of earnings and income and the paying, buying, and consuming power. And when the farm buying and consuming power is restored by the reverse of currency operations, the farmer's demand upon retail merchants for goods, farm supplies, and equipment will bring orders reaching back through wholesale house to factory and workshop. The wheels of industry will start production to meet orders and the demand bringing a return of employment to industrial labor and restoring their earnings and income and their buying and consuming power. [Applause.]

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of directing attention to the speech of the gentleman from Texas. He spoke about the Federal Reserve notes, and said it took a dollar's worth of gold to be deposited by the bank in order to get to issue $2.50 worth of currency. I wish the gentleman would apply the same argument to the national-bank currency, which has nothing behind it in the way of gold.

Mr. PATMAN. Yes; there is more than a billion dollars outstanding of that kind.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have a very important amendment that I intend to offer in a few minutes. On page 10, at the top of the page, you will see the words "and income derived therefrom." I do not need to argue that we have far too many tax-exempt securities in this country. At the end you are going to have $31,000,000,000 Government securities tax exempt, and that means $31,000,000,000 worth of wealth that you cannot tax.

The chairman of the committee, this morning, when I asked him why he added the words "and income derived therefrom", said that it had always been so.

I do not consider that a very good answer. I do not care if it has always been that way. That does not make it right. I showed the gentleman from Texas later that it had not always been that way. I have in my hand the first Farm Loan Act with reference to selling farm-loan bonds, and on page 21 there is this statement that—

> These bonds are not taxable by National, State, municipal, or local authorities.

There is not a word about interest. I want to say that there never was anything put in the act about interest until after March 1931.

I will tell you why it was put in there. It was put in there then because the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of the Pacific Co. versus Johnson, cited in Two Hundred and Ninety-eighth Pacific Reporter, 489, which was taken to the Supreme Court, reversed its former decisions and held that you could figure income from tax-exempt securities in making estimates for the purpose of taxing franchise corporations. I venture to say that there are not three men on the floor of this House who can tell you how you figure franchise taxes. In my State it is 50 cents on the hundred dollars, based on the net income of the corporation.

In other words, if a corporation had a million-dollar income, if it owned all these bonds, it would have that from these bonds right here, it is taxed at 50 cents on a hundred dollars. Figured on that as net income every year it would be over $7,000,000. This clause of two or three words may not mean very much to any of you gentlemen, but to the franchise-paying corporations of the country it means a possible $7,000,000 saving, and we ought not to be here legislating to save light companies and power companies and banks who own these bonds.

The first act passed here to help the farmer did not have this language in it, and this clause was not put in there until the court said that you could tax that income from these tax-exempt securities. When we get to the particular point of this bill I intend to offer an amendment to strike out on page 10 the words "and the income derived therefrom." We are doing plenty for the banks and the holders of these bonds now. We are going to guarantee the principal on the bonds and make the bonds exempt, and is there any sense in going still further and saying that you cannot tax the income on the bonds?

I am for the bill; I want to help the farmer, but you cannot show me a farmer that owns one of these bonds, and you cannot come in here under the guise of helping the farmer and help the speculators and the companies who own these bonds, and say that you did it in the name of the farmer. They had these bonds when you were not guaranteeing the principal and now they still keep them, and they will buy them yet if you cut out of this bill this little clause about exempting the interest from these bonds. It is enough, it is too much, to exempt the principal, but when you add to that the exemption of the interest you are saying to these companies, "We will not only exempt your property but we will exempt the income from that property." I trust gentlemen here who owe nothing to those who own these bonds will vote for this amendment when it is offered.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, no one has a higher regard than I for the chairman of this committee, the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], and were this committee, were this Congress, were the President of the United States to administer this bill, to appoint the officials in the appraisal division of the Federal land bank then I would say that the bill is one of the greatest pieces of statesmanship that we have considered. I am going to vote for the bill, but I am going to vote for a motion to recommit and substitute the Frazier bill therefor if it is offered. During the past 3 months, the 3 months preceding the assembly of this Congress, my time was spent in gaining certain information and charges against the appraisal division of the Federal land bank in the fourth district, headed by Mr. P. L. Gaddis, chief of the appraisal division of the whole land bank system, and also by Mr. A. S. Goss, the present land-bank commissioner. I want to read about six lines from the report recently made by Mr. Goss, according to the press, which he had not denied, and in which he gives a complete whitewash of the investigation that was conducted in Ohio for the period of 1 month by his own investigator, and I here and now challenge Mr. Goss, land-bank commissioner, to bring forth the testimony and the findings of his own investigator in answer to my charges that political favoritism had been shown in the selection of appraisers.

He says that these charges have not been substantiated, and he said in answer to my charge that political activity was prevalent everywhere and that a Hoover Republican machine was being built up by the appraisal division, that the evidence is not substantiated there. I say to you that I can and will substantiate each and every one of these charges. I expect to support this bill, but I do not propose to support fellows who have been mismanaging the appraisal division of these Federal land banks for the past 7 years. [Applause.] We need a new deal in this appraisal division of the Federal land bank system, and we need it now. I can show you where several times as many applications for loans in our State have either been rejected or are being held in abeyance than the number of loans actually granted. Fifty-eight million dollars worth of applications for loans from the State of Ohio are on file at Louisville, Ky. Approximately 10 percent of those have actually been negotiated, and the money paid over to the distressed farmer. I agree with some gentlemen in this House who say this system is unsound and that we ought to refinance every farm mortgage with Treasury notes. I tell you that the farmers in my State, as long as we have 2½-cent hogs and 3½-cent cattle and 10 cents a pound butter fat, simply cannot make the grade. They are condemned to bankruptcy just as surely as the sun rises and sets as long as you have a lot of theorists administering the thing.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. TRUAX was granted leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and to include a matter from the report referred to by him.)

Mr. TRUAX. I am herewith inserting in the RECORD copy of my letter to the President of the United States, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, under date of December 7, 1933:

DECEMBER 7, 1933.

Honorable FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Herewith I am respectfully submitting a report on the administration of the Farm Loan Act in Ohio. Following exhaustive investigation over a period of several months by and with the use of extensive correspondence, interviewing witnesses, securing sworn statements and affidavits, and careful consideration of many complaints from landowners, the following conclusions are reached:

The appraisal division in Ohio as now constituted is a partisan, political machine designed and created for the purpose of accomplishing certain selfish acts and ulterior motives:

(1) Discredit Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States.

(2) Sabotage the Roosevelt administration and the new deal.

(3) Nullify the purpose and intent of the Farm Loan Act of 1933 as passed by the Seventy-third Congress.

(4) Arouse antagonism and resentment among the farmers against the Roosevelt administration.

(5) Safeguard the interests of bondholders instead of refinancing distressed farmers about to be foreclosed.

(6) Build up a 100-percent political machine.

(7) Disqualify and reject Democratic applicants for appraisers.

(8) Disqualify and reject actual farmers for positions as appraisers.

(9) Disqualify and reject applicants over 45 years of age.

(10) Perpetuate themselves, their relatives, and their friends in office.

(12) Belittle, slander, and besmirch Democratic Congressmen.

(13) Promote the candidacies and elections of Republican Congressmen in 1934.

(14) To promote the candidacies of Republican candidates for governor in 1934.

(15) To promote the candidacy and election of a Republican President in 1936.

The officials in charge of the appraisal division in Ohio are: P. L. Gaddis, chief of the appraisal section, land-bank division, Washington, D.C.; Thomas T. Neely, reviewing appraiser, Louisville, Ky.; B. G. DeWeese, assistant reviewing appraiser, Louisville, Ky.; W. L. Hammond, assistant reviewing appraiser, Louisville, Ky.; John S. Beard, supervisor appraiser, Springfield, Ohio.

Ten supervisor appraisers were named: J. S. Beard, Springfield, Ohio; Vaughn H. Chase, Albany, Ohio; Charles F. Class, Lebanon, Ohio; F. G. Hall, Wilmington, Ohio; Frank E. Karr, Coshocton, Ohio; Floyd H. Miller, Greenville, Ohio; Milton D. Slusser, Columbus Grove, Ohio; A. R. Stokesbury, Columbus, Ohio; Walter R. Wheelock, Warren, Ohio; A. L. Winter, Bucyrus, Ohio.

All of the above supervisors with the exception of Mr. A. L. Winter are stanch Republicans. Mr. Winter was defeated for the Democratic nomination for city auditor, Bucyrus, Ohio, in the August primaries of 1933.

According to the latest compilations and available information, the number of appraisers employed is 186, as follows:

Republicans	142
Democrats	42
Roosevelt Republican	1
Socialist	1

Prior to the appointment of P. L. Gaddis as chief of the appraisal section, land-bank division, September 15, 1933, Farm Credit Administration, this position was occupied by A. M. Cardon, son-in-law of ex-Senator Reed Smoot, of Utah. Second in command was

Thomas T. Neely, reviewing appraiser, stationed at the Federal Land Bank, Louisville, Ky. Mr. Neely is in charge of the appraisal division for the fourth land-bank district, comprising the States of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Indiana, subject only to the instructions from Washington.

Upon the recommendation of Thomas T. Neely and probably the recommendation also of P. L. Gaddis, B. G. DeWeese, of Greenville, Ohio, was appointed assistant reviewing appraiser.

W. L. Hammond, at one time appraiser for the Kentucky joint-stock land bank, and for the past 5 or 6 years an appraiser for the Federal land bank, was called in as another assistant to Mr. Neely. His specific duties were to assist in the organization of the force of appraisers.

John S. Beard, an ex-banker of Springfield, Ohio, was selected by Messrs. Neely and DeWeese as the man to supervise the various so-called "schools of instruction" for applicants for appraisal jobs. The title of Mr. Beard is supervising appraiser.

The sixth man appearing in the picture is A. R. Stokesbury, veteran appraiser, formerly from Washington Court House, but now a residence of Columbus.

It is of particular significance that each and every one of these officials heading up the Ohio organization are known as staunch Hoover Republicans.

In these so-called "schools" presided over by Mr. Beard and assisted by Mr. DeWeese, the political affiliation of the applicant was first ascertained before his "education" began. If he was a Democrat, he was immediately turned over to the tender mercies of one of the nine hard-boiled Republican supervisors.

If the Democratic applicant mustered sufficient courage to ask questions of these Republican bouncers, he was immediately rebuked by an answer something like this, "Get it the same way I got it." These bouncers even went so far that upon finding two of the Democratic applicants with their heads together trying to figure out exactly what was wanted by their superiors, they were told to "disperse", that no such examples of cooperation would be tolerated.

If sizzling temperatures prevailed as did most of the time last summer late in the fall, the Democratic applicants were taken by these Republican bouncers over hilly, stony, worn-out land, and compelled to tramp from end to end and corner to corner.

They were forced to start work at 7 o'clock in the morning, visiting the offices of county surveyor, county sheriff, county recorder, county treasurer, and copy records, and then tramp over at least two farms per day, returning to their hotels at from 7 p.m. to 10 p.m. The remainder of the time until breakfast the following morning was spent filling out the voluminous report blanks, drawing maps and plats of the farms and fields—they had to be not only ordinary draftsmen and artists, but color artists as well, to meet the requirements of the Neely, DeWeese, Hammond, Beard, and Stokesbury oligarchy.

Mr. Floyd Miller, a Republican supervisor from Greenville, Ohio, and next-door neighbor of Mr. DeWeese, makes a practice of calling on the preacher in the particular community in which he is training supervisors. If the preacher says the applicant is no good, it means curtains for the poor devil. Miller does not believe in divorce, consequently applicants for loans who have had a rift in their matrimonial relations should steer clear of Supervisor Miller.

One of the first duties of these bouncing Republican supervisors was to craftily ascertain whether or not the applicant had been recommended by a Democratic Congressman or Senator. If so, it meant the end of the trail for that particular applicant. Pains were always taken to admonish the applicant that "no politics are permitted in this organization."

Personally, as director of agriculture for the State of Ohio, 1923–29, and having had considerable dealings with the various agricultural-educational institutions in Ohio, and certain so-called "farm organizations" that really farm the farmer, I have learned that the cry of "no politics" always means a solid Republican front.

CHARLES V. TRUAX.

In the list of 186 appraisers, very few actual farmers are found. The nonfarming occupations represented include ex-bankers, county agents, insurance salesmen, real-estate agents, automobile salesmen, oil and gasoline salesmen, school teachers, Republican county chairmen, defeated Republican county and municipal officeholders, ex-postmasters, dry cleaners, dry-goods clerks, barbers, electric-refrigerator salesmen, cement salesmen, operator of a swimming pool, general contractor, garage and battery service men, ex-prohibition officer, and furnace salesmen.

As a consequence, the large portion of appraisals made during the early administration of the act were so ridiculously low as to receive no consideration whatsoever from mortgagees. The majority of these appraisers were unsympathetic with the farmer, having no knowledge whatsoever of his problems and distress, even going so far as to insult him upon leaving his premises.

These so-called "appraisers" were compelled to carry augers to bore into the soil to determine what the soil would produce. The farmer's estate had not fallen low enough—he must now be bedeviled with an army of white-collared, soil-boring, misfit appraisers.

During the early part of December I called upon the Honorable W. Forbes Morgan, Deputy Governor of the Farm Credit Administration, who assured me that practically all charges had been verified by his special investigator, who had spent approximately 1 month in Ohio conducting his investigation, and that within the near future there would be a general shake-up and many dismissals in the personnel of the appraisal department in Ohio. No official communication to this effect has as yet been received from Mr. Morgan.

Under date of January 3, 1934, however, the following statement was released to the press by Mr. A. S. Goss, land bank commissioner:

OF INTEREST IN OHIO, INDIANA, KENTUCKY, AND TENNESSEE

A. S. Goss, Land Bank Commissioner, stated today that reports from special investigators in the fourth Federal land-bank district of charges to the effect that the appraisers of the Federal Land Bank of Louisville have been selected because of their political affiliations, that they have been building up a political machine within the district, and that they have not properly appraised farms offered as security for loans in an effort to discredit the administration have not been substantiated.

"While it appears that a reasonable interpretation of the rule regarding political activity has been violated in a very few cases," said Mr. Goss, "it is felt that this was probably done without design. This rule provides that in the selection of appraisers care should be taken to avoid the employment of anyone who has been active in recent political campaigns in behalf of any party. In every case where it is felt that this rule has been violated the appraisers' appointments have been canceled. The investigators found only a very few appraisers who could be so classified.

"Appraisers are appointed primarily because of their ability to carry out the duties imposed upon them and not because of their political affiliation," stated Mr. Goss. "It is expected, in the natural course of events, when men are selected on the basis of their merits, the result will be an approximate cross section of the population, so far as political affiliations are concerned.

"No basis was found for the statement that appraisers have been talking or working against the administration. A special investigator reported no proof of any such cases, with the exception of statements by one or two men who had been unsuccessful applicants for the position of appraiser.

"The report indicates that there is every evidence that the appraisers have been honestly striving to appraise land in line with the intent of Congress that the earning power of the land shall be a principal factor in determining its value. Although in some cases, shortly after the Farm Credit Administration was organized, values established on the best land apparently did not give full consideration to the normal income based on 1909–14 prices of products. As fast as these are located these cases are being corrected.

"We have made such progress in the appraisal of farms offered as security for loans in the fourth district that we are laying off a large number of appraisers and making some shifts in personnel. T. T. Neely, reviewing appraiser, and B. G. DeWeese, junior reviewing appraiser, have been assigned to supervisional work, and W. F. Marshall, formerly assistant reviewing appraiser in the St. Louis district and lately assisting the Farm Credit Administration in Indiana and Ohio, has been appointed acting reviewing appraiser for the fourth district."

I now charge that this so-called "report" is merely a coat of whitewash applied so that the same old crowd can continue to maladminister the Federal Farm Loan Act for their own selfish ends to the eventual demoralization of farmers whose applications have been rejected, and to belittle the noble efforts of the best friend the common people ever had in the White House, President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

For the officials of the Federal land bank itself at Louisville, Ky., namely, Hon. Ernest Rice, president, and Hon. M. S. Kennedy, Jr., vice president and secretary, I have only words of the highest praise.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which is on the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOEPPEL: Page 4, line 17, after the word "Treasury," insert the following: "Provided however, that in no event shall such bonds bear interest in excess of 2½ per centum per annum."

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill. It is a progressive measure. The amendment which I have offered, I believe, will make it a more perfect measure.

I intend to offer another amendment which I will not discuss, but it will be read. What we are proposing to do is to issue tax-exempt bonds, which I am sure will bear 4-percent interest; yet at the same time we are taking the money from the Postal Savings Department and turning it over to the bankers of America, without 1 cent of guarantee. They will take these Postal Savings funds which they obtain from the Government for 2½ percent and invest these funds in these bonds which we are now considering and which will pay them 4-percent interest. More specifically we will be paying the bankers 1½-percent interest to lend our own money to ourselves. If you adopt my amendment, you will actually save the farmers of America $30,000,000 per annum. Our Postal Savings money is now being turned over to those banks without any security whatever, and the bankers simply take that money and purchase these tax-exempt bonds, paying 4-percent interest. An exceptionally fine profit for the bankers.

Yesterday I was accused of stating that this Congress was dominated by the bankers. Your vote on this amendment will prove if this Congress is or is not dominated by the banking interests. If you adopt this amendment, you save the farmers $30,000,000 per year interest. If you reject this amendment, they will be forced to pay that amount of money needlessly. Let the world know and let the people everywhere know if this Congress is interested in the farmers or whether it is interested in entrenched wealth and coupon clippers. I am going to vote for this bill even though my amendment fails, as I am thinking of those poor people out in the country, people who are in abject distress, and to whom the bankers will not extend any relief. I want to see something done for the people. I want to see it done with the least expense possible to the distressed farmers. I hope you will accept this amendment. As soon as it is voted on, I will offer another one, which I do not care to discuss now; but if you accept this second amendment, you will save the farmers of America $80,000,000 per annum on interest alone, because the amendment which I have offered proposes issuance of United States Federal notes to extend credit direct to the farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL] has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I offer another amendment, which is at the desk, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOEPPEL: Page 5, line 11, after the word "authorized", strike out commencing with the word "to" through the word "hereunder", in line 16, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "to issue $2,000,000,000 in United States notes which shall be legal tender for all purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. After 90 days after the enactment of this act, no Federal land bank shall issue any bonds under the provisions of the last paragraph of section 32 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, subject to the guaranty of interest on such bonds by the United States, but this provision shall not apply to the issuance of any bond to refinance any bond which is or has been issued subject to such guaranty of interest.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not represent a farming district, but I am in sympathy with many of the problems of the farmers in my State and in other States, because I know they affect my district, which is an industrial district.

I notice we have been concerned with the way the appraisal forces of the Federal Government are acting on appraisals. I have not yet seen anything done about the old Federal farm land bank acts. There are a great many people in my district, which is a city district, an industrial district, who have the savings of their lifetime invested in farm mortgages. There are a great number of widows, workers, teachers, and small investors of all kinds who were told for years they should put their money into farm mortgages, as it was the safest kind of investment. They have practically lost all of their savings as a result of present conditions. They believe it is right to reduce and scale down their mortgages to a fair basis of present-day land values, but their position is this: They are being asked by the Federal Government to scale down their mortgages, and the Federal land bank refuses to scale down mortgages which it has carried for a number of years.

I received a letter yesterday which shows the situation of a great many farmers in my State and may account for some of the reasons why people who are holding farm mortgages are reluctant to scale down those mortgages and accept farm-loan bonds in return for those mortgages. I want to read a part of this letter which shows what has happened in my State as a result of the administration of some of the Federal farm loan laws that we have passed here.

The gentleman writes me as follows:

I secured a loan of the Federal Land Bank of St. Paul in 1918 for $1,900. I paid all my installments, taxes, insurance, etc., up to March 15, 1931, at which time I only paid part of the installment. In December 1931 they wanted a quitclaim deed of my farm, which I refused to give. I begged for leniency, because I have all my life work and savings in that farm. I have improved it considerably since the loan was granted.

I had the misfortune to lose my wife a few years ago, so I have three small children to take care of. In spite of all my best efforts, I was unable to meet any more payments. Therefore, the Federal land bank started foreclosure proceedings a year ago. I believe they got court action on January 7, 1933. I also owed another small mortgage on the farm. The holder of the second mortgage would settle for $200, if the Federal land bank would scael down their mortgage so that I could get a Commissioner's loan.

I have been told that they cannot scale down their mortgages under the present law. If not, it should be changed.

One of the Federal land bank men told me that they had to give me a chance to buy it back after they foreclosed before they could sell it to anyone else. There is something wrong with the system. I borrowed $1,900—I had to buy $95 of stock in the land bank, on which stock I have received dividend two times in 14 years. I paid $61.75 every 6 months for 12 or 13 years, making $1,472 more than I have paid. The $95 of bank stock is not worth the paper it is written on. On top of that, two Federal land-bank officers told me in August 1933 that it would take $2,200 to redeem their claim. It all seems very queer to me.

This is just one of the instances that have come to my attention from my own State where the Federal Government, which is supposed to be administering these laws we passed for the relief of the farmer, is refusing to do exactly what they are asking the mortgage holders and small investors to do. We might at least be logical and not ask the investor in farm mortgages to do what the Government refuses to do.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I yield.

Mr. WILSON. Does not the gentleman think if we increased the amount that may be loaned by the farm commissioners it would relieve many of these situations?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I think it would relieve the situation if we could get the commissioners to scale down their mortgages just as they are asking the mortgagees to do with their mortgages. The Government should set the example where relief to the farmer is concerned.

Mr. WILSON. If we increased the amount of the loans that may be made by the farm commissioners, would not that take care of the situation?

Mr. O'MALLEY. It might be of help, if the gentleman says so. In my State they are making appraisals on an acreage basis and have used in many cases, as a guide, appraisals made in other States. Why, there are buildings on farms in my State that are insured for more than what 400 or 500 acres of land in other States are worth. I am, however, not familiar with appraisal work going on now, but I am familiar with the distress of the small investors in farm mortgages in the cities.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the Speaker has said that if we are to finish this bill this afternoon we must do so pretty soon. I am sure the Membership does not want the bill to go over until tomorrow, so I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Direct loans made under section 7 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., sup. VII, title 12, sec. 723), or under section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, may, at the option of the Federal land bank or the Land Bank Commissioner, as the case may be, be made in bonds of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of this additional measure, for it will help the farmers of the Second District of West Virginia, which I am happy, in my humble way, to represent here in the House of Representatives. I do want to say this afternoon, however, before consideration of this measure closes, that I have found during the past several months that the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, which has under its jurisdiction the five States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Delaware, and the District of Columbia, has partially failed to function for the real relief of the farmers of the district I represent. I believe this afternoon we might well say to ourselves as Members of this body that it is not alone our duty to think about these complaints as they come to us in our offices, but that we should actually present them to those who are in charge of the Federal Farm Credit Administration in Washington, D.C.

Many times I have appeared personally in behalf of farmers whose appeal could not go unheeded because they were worthy of aid.

I have received a communication from Judge C. M. Ward, of the tenth judicial circuit of West Virginia. I read the following letter:

BECKLEY, W.VA., October 10, 1933.

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
Elkins, W.Va.

DEAR SIR: I am writing you with reference to the Federal home loan bank and the Federal farm loan bank. Since August 1, as judge of the circuit court of this county, I have had for confirmation sales of 21 homes of people sold under deeds of trust, and there are numerous other sales which will take place in the near future. There has not been one single loan that I know of made by the Federal home loan bank to Raleigh County. These sales, of course, usually are made at prices prevailing under the present depression, as no person is able to bid except the lender. I have directed resales in a few instances, and the property brought no more, and usually the lender purchased it. This deplorable condition was the subject of a great many speeches in the Democratic campaign last fall. It seems to me that something should be done to relieve this situation. The home loan bank is to the poor debtor like the gold at the end of the rainbow. I do not know why this is true, but I have had numerous debtors come to me whose property was encumbered by deed of trust that was worth much more than the debt, and yet they could get no relief. I think the President's policy is honest, sincere, and correct, but in order to carry it out it passes through numerous individuals down to the various counties, and, of course, those persons must have the same policy and the same theory or it will not work. I know of numerous instances where farmers have applied for loans to the Federal farm loan bank, and for some cause they were turned down. I know the surety was all right, because usually it was an old loan that had been made by the farm loan bank and had been reduced considerably. This is as deplorable as the other condition.

Hoping that something may be done to relieve this situation, I am,

Yours very truly,

C. M. WARD.

The reason I read this letter this afternoon is to say that I heartily concur in this measure, because I believe it is an additional fortification for the farmers of this country.

We must have in the administration of these farm measures that sympathetic approach which, to a very real extent, has been lacking heretofore. It is a fact that in West Virginia appraisals were made which were based on too finely drawn rules and too little of the human treatment the farmer needs in this time of trouble.

I received also a letter from Mr. Georg Ward, of my own county, who is serving as chairman of the agricultural development committee of the West Virgina Bankers' Association, who writes as follows:

MILL CREEK, W.VA., October 2, 1933.

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In the working out of the new deal as it applies to us locally there are a few problems that seem difficult to answer, and the relief measures made available seem to fall far short of the mark in producing results.

I am now serving my second term as chairman of the agricultural development committee of the West Virginia Bankers Association. Under national direction our theme this year will be "farm credits." In other words we will, through our contacts with our farmer clientele, assist them to refinance themselves and carry on, if they are in debt, and to exchange current loans that have become frozen for mortgage loans that will give them easier terms and longer time. This, as you have many times been told, will work a tremendous relief on the banks that are burdened with frozen loans of this character.

My own experiences, while possibly not impressive, can best illustrate the problems we find before us.

Early in last March I told a number of our farmer customers, who were borrowing and could not possibly repay within reasonable time, that they should apply for loans from the Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, which serves our district, to repay their fixed debt to us. They promptly did so, in one case 6 months ago. About 2 months ago the appraiser called on this party and on us. He asked us the value of the farm in question on a normal basis, and was told it was $6,000. He said he agreed with us, and approved the loan of $2,100 and told the applicant he should receive his loan in a few days. Today the applicant is advised that he can get a loan of $1,200 if he will keep his buildings insured for $500. The owner has between $8,000 and $9,000 in the place, which has a good residence and large barn on it and more than 60 acres of good bottom land that last year produced on a test acre 360 bushels of potatoes. And today the Government is trying to buy 1,000 acres of bottom land in this vicinity at $50 per acre and is unable to do so because the price is too low for the owners to sell. There is a greater amount of pasture and hill land in the place to be included in the mortgage also in addition to the bottom land. This is the only applicant out of at least eight that I have told to apply for farm loans who has had his land appraised.

If $10 per acre is what they mean to loan on typical Tygarts Valley farm land, where $75 per acre was loaned 10 years ago, I am wondering where to strike the chord called "normal values." The party is now owing us $1,900, so you can see the absurdity and utter impossibility of their offer. How much of a decline is to be expected from land that has had a normal value of $100 to $125 per acre and has this year produced and sold to the C.C.C., thanks to your efforts on our behalf which we will always remember, $1,400 worth of potatoes from 4 acres? Just what does the Federal Farm Loan Board mean by the word "value"?

Just today and at several times previously we have received literature from the loan agency of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation urging us to adopt a policy of liberal credit. The Federal land banks and the home loan banks have been held up as the agencies to save the frozen banks by taking over their sound but slow assets. You are familiar with the promises that have never been made good to relieve the banks and relieve the debt-burdened farmers. I do not believe they mean a word they have said. They do not want sound loans, and money is harder to pry away from them than donations for charity from a Scotchman.

Now, to look at the alternative. Shall we place our note portfolio with our attorney and tell him to collect them? Doubtless this would result in reducing the properties to ownership for lack of bids. Then we could say to our depositors, "We have only these farm lands and homes with which to pay you. The officers of the loan agencies have urged us to not foreclose; to wait until they could relieve the borrower and also us." Is this the answer, 6 months after the application was filed?

Frankly, if the Government agencies mean to help by lending money, they will have to do just that—lend some money. If one agency of the Government will buy the land at $50 per acre, it certainly tends to show a value approaching that figure at least. Then the loan agency says they will loan $12.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield.

Mr. PALMISANO. Does the gentleman know, speaking of the Land Bank of Baltimore, that they have been working night and day? I understand that last month they made 500 loans more than they made in November, and that in November they had made 1,000 more than they had in any other month.

Mr. RANDOLPH. To the distinguished gentleman from Maryland I may say that I do know that; and the only reason we have had any action out of Baltimore in the last few weeks is because the Members of Congress from these five States actually got on the backs of officials representing the Federal Land Bank in Baltimore. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The twelfth paragraph of section 12 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., sup. VII, title 12, sec. 772), is amended to read as follows:

"Amounts transmitted to farm-loan associations by Federal land banks to be loaned to its members shall, at the option of the bank, be in current funds or Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds, or, at the option of the borrower, in farm-loan bonds."

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in the remarks of the two distinguished gentlemen who have just spoken with reference to the operations of the Federal land banks. It happens I have the honor to represent three counties in western New York. One of these counties, based upon area, ranks fourth among the 3,000 counties in the United States in the value of its agricultural products.

During the period of the war some loans were placed there on marginal lands, which ought not to have been made. When prices went down after the war, the people moved off the lands. These loans remain unpaid; but I may say at the present time that the farmers in my section of the country are getting very slight relief from the recent appropriations made by Congress.

I hesitate somewhat to come on the floor of the House and make this statement, because I fear some of the Democratic side may think I am talking politics or criticizing the administration; but I am not doing so. I know that in my section of the country some of the finest farmers, men who have always had good incomes, who never until this depression had found it necessary to encumber their farms—these men have been examples to the country in the careful management of their farms, yet because of the depression they have found it necessary at this time to make applications for loans. Many of them have old family homesteads, and the sentimental attachment to these farms is such that they would almost give their lives to save the farms. They are sound credit risks, and yet they cannot get loans to save their farms. It is almost impossible even to get men to come down and make the appraisals.

If I had the power, and if I were on the majority side of the House, I would demand a thorough investigation. I would see that the land bank law was administered properly and that it functioned in the interest of the farmers. It is not functioning that way now in many parts of the country; surely not in my district.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. (a) Section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., sup. VII, title 12, sec. 781), is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new paragraphs:

"Fifteenth. To exchange farm-loan bonds for Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds of equal face value, and to purchase Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds at or below par.

"Sixteenth. To exchange Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds for farm-loan bonds of equal face value."

(b) The seventh paragraph of section 22 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 897), is amended by adding the following after the first subparagraph (d) thereof:

"(e) To purchase Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I am going to vote for this bill and I hope it passes. I am sure it will. If we can guarantee these bonds, we can guarantee the home-loan bonds.

I realize that we must do something for the farmers. If we do not do something for the farmers in order to bring back their purchasing power, we are not going to be able to sell the commodities that are manufactured in my city. I made the statement when the original home loan bill was up for consideration that it was a fraud upon the public. When you brought the amendments in at the last session, I repeated that language, and I repeat it again today. It has saved the homes of a few, but not many. Homes are being taken away from my people every day on account of the wording of that act. I think if it is sound to guarantee these bonds we can do likewise so far as concerns the home-loan bonds, and I rise here for the purpose of asking the Committee on Banking and Currency to give consideration to this most important question, so that my people might be saved the loss of their homes. I assure you they have been losing them in large numbers the last year.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 (U.S.C., sup. VII, title 12, sec. 1016) is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: "Upon issuance of the charter of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, the Land Bank Commissioner shall, in his name, make loans under this section on behalf of such Corporation, and the mortgages and credit instruments secured thereby, together with the funds available to the Land Bank Commissioner under this section, are transferred to such Corporation. The proceeds of bonds issued under section 4 of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation Act are hereby made available for the purposes of this section, but the face value of bonds which may be issued for such purposes shall not exceed $600,000,000."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 9, line 3, after the word "The", insert the words "bonds and."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and the members of the committee for favorably reporting this bill to the House. I think also I can join in their statement that great relief has come from the acts of the last session of Congress providing for Commissioner's loans, which are to be continued under this bill when passed.

I desire to make one suggestion which I believe will be in accord with the experience of every Member of the House. The amount of the Commissioner's loan should be increased. The limit of $5,000 brings relief of course to a great many of those who are in distress. The purpose of the loan is to refinance and save the farmer his home, which he is in danger of losing because of existing indebtedness, whether it be to Federal land bank, a local bank, an individual, or an insurance company, and provides for a second mortgage to take care of his delinquencies and taxes. In a time of depression like this it is the most effective loan that can come to the farmer. I believe we should increase the limit of the loan from $5,000 to $10,000. That would reach probably 60 percent more farmers than it does now. The only possible objection, if it be an objection, that could be raised, is that it would require more money for that purpose. When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation needed more money for railroads or banks, we have been ready to provide it; and if we could continue these Commissioner's loans and increase the limit up to $10,000 for the purpose of refinancing the farmer to save the home or repurchasing it after it has been foreclosed, we would bring to the farmers of our Nation an essential and direct relief. Unless there is an increase above $5,000 for Commissioner's loans, you will not reach 50 percent of those whose farms will be foreclosed.

Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to increase the limit of the Commissioner's loans from $5,000 up to $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WILSON offers the following amendment: On page 9, after line 7, insert the following as a new section:

"SEC. 10. Section 32 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933 is amended by striking out '$5,000' and inserting in lieu thereof '$10,000.'"

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to raise a point of order against this amendment. There is nothing in the section which refers to individual loans. This might at the proper time receive consideration, but at the present time I do not think it is proper. I do not believe the amendment is germane.

Mr. WILSON. This is to be a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman care to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WILSON. This adds a new section to the bill. It should be in order for that reason. It is not an amendment to a section. It does not change the language of the section but is offered as an entirely new section to the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] is agreeable to having the amendment read "$7,500", and under the circumstances I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw the point of order?

Mr. JONES. I withdraw the point of order. I assume it is worded correctly otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment offered by Mr. WILSON: Strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$7,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, with this amendment the bill when passed increases the funds available to the Farm Loan Commissioner for emergency relief loans from $200,000,000 to $600,000,000, and the amount of the individual loan to one farmer from $5,000 to $7,500.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. (a) The Corporation, including its franchise, its capital, reserves, and surplus, and its income shall be exempt from all taxation now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority; except that any real property of the Corporation shall be subject to State, Territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

(b) Mortgages executed to the Land Bank Commissioner and mortgages held by the Corporation, and the credit instruments secured thereby, and bonds issued by the Corporation under the provisions of this act, shall be deemed and held to be instrumentalities of the Government of the United States, and as such they and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation (except estate, inheritance, and gift taxes).

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BIERMANN: On page 9, line 25, strike out all after the comma.

On page 10, strike out lines 1 and 2.

On page 10, line 3, insert the word "not" between the words "shall" and "be."

On page 10, line 4, insert a period after the word "taxation", and strike out the rest of the line.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is adopted, section (b) will read:

Mortgages executed by the Land Bank Commissioner and mortgages held by the Corporation and the credit instruments secured thereby, and bonds issued by the Corporation under the provisions of this act, shall not be exempt from Federal, State, municipal, and local taxation.

The purpose of the amendment is to eliminate these bonds from the vast number of bonds of our country that are tax exempt. We will be asked, I imagine, at this session of Congress to provide for the guaranty of $2,000,000,000 of home-loan bonds, and I believe before this session of Congress expires the bonded indebtedness of the United States will amount to something like $30,000,000,000.

As long as I can remember anything about public affairs we have been talking about the evils of tax-exempt securities, but I do not know that the Congress has done anything about them. I do not believe these farm-loan bonds, particularly, should be tax exempt. If they are made tax exempt, the home-owners' bonds should be tax exempt.

However, the point I want to bring out here is just this: It is time for the Congress to give some consideration to the evil of tax-exempt securities. This is the first bill that has anything to do with the issuance of bonds, and here is a pretty good place for this Congress to begin doing away with the evil, especially when we are confronted with the job of refinancing $10,000,000,000 of bonds in the very near future. I am sure it would meet with the approval of our constituents and the applause of the country if we would start out now and say that we are not going to issue any more tax-exempt Government bonds. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken; and Mr. BIERMANN asked for a division.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Mr. JONES. Let us have a division.

Mr. GOSS. Very well; I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided and there were—ayes 51, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section, and all amendments thereto, close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment, on page 10, line 2, to strike out the words "and the income derived therefrom."

The argument has been made here that you cannot sell these bonds if you do not make them tax-exempt. If this argument is correct, and I do not know about that—I do not think it is correct, but even if it is, they cannot use that same argument if you do not also make the interest on these bonds tax-exempt, and I will tell you why. You offered, not a month ago, $1,000,000,000 worth of Government securities at 2⅞-percent interest and they were oversubscribed three times.

Now, what I ask you to do is this: If you are going to make them tax-exempt, all right, but do not say to the State of California, and to the State of Kentucky, and the other States that they cannot even tax the interest on these bonds. Leave us something to tax. You do not say in these bonds that you cannot tax the farmer's old cow. You do not say that you cannot tax his corn or his land, but you say that you cannot tax the bond of the banker. You say that you cannot tax the interest on them, and all I am asking you to do is to strike out these three words.

This language was not in the first Farm Loan Act. It was not in any act until the California case which I quoted from a moment ago was decided by the Supreme Court and it was held that you could tax the interest on these tax-exempt securities.

The gentleman representing the committee is going to say this will injure the sale of the bonds, but I call your attention to the fact that bonds offered by this Government at a rate of interest 1¼ percent lower than these bonds were oversubscribed three times, and the small income tax or the small franchise tax that the State might impose will not injure the sale of the bonds one iota.

I ask you people who want to do something for the great common masses represented by your farmers here and want the bankers and those who have money to stand their part of the burdens of Government to strike out this provision that allows their interest to go untaxed.

I am told there are concerns in this country drawing hundreds of thousands of dollars in income from tax-exempt securities. There is no sense in this and we ought to strike out this provision. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 2, after the word "the", strike out the words "and the income derived therefrom."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to say what the gentleman from Kentucky said I would. I am going to say that this language is copied literally from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, under which we are issuing industrial bonds. It seems strange that a gentleman representing a farming district would seek to put in an amendment making these bonds less desirable than those issued in industry. We ask that the same language be put in these bonds that are in the bonds issued in industry so that the farmers may get the benefit of it. When this feature is eliminated, let it be eliminated for industry as well as agriculture. Why saddle another burden on agriculture unless the same yardstick is applied to industry? Can anyone deny the justice of that position?

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky) there were 24 ayes and 89 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

SEC. 14. (a) Section 5 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933 (U.S.C., sup. VII, title 12, sec. 1131i) is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(e) The amount of all balances, collections, and appropriations allocated under subsection (a) to the revolving fund created thereunder, which is in excess of $120,000,000, is hereby made available to the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration for the establishment of a revolving fund of not to exceed $40,000,000. Out of such revolving fund, the Governor is authorized to allocate and expend such amounts as he deems necessary for subscriptions to the capital stock and/or paid-in surplus of Federal intermediate-credit banks."

(b) The first sentence of paragraph (a) of section 2 of the Agricultural Credits Act, approved March 4, 1923 (U.S.C., sup. VII, title 12, sec. 1061), as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and the following: "which amount may be increased from time to time with the approval of the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration."

(c) Section 2 of the Agricultural Credits Act, approved March 4, 1923 (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 1061), as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration is hereby authorized to subscribe from time to time to the capital stock and/or paid-in surplus of any Federal intermediate-credit bank on behalf of the United States, in such amounts as he may determine are necessary for the purpose of meeting the credit needs of eligible borrowers from the bank, and the amount of the capital stock and paid-in surplus of such bank may be increased or decreased from time to time by the Governor, in accordance with such needs. Such stock shall be divided into shares of $100 each and subscriptions to such paid-in surplus shall be made in multiples of $100 out of the revolving fund created under subsection (e) of section 5 of the Farm Credit Act of 1933, as amended. The Governor on behalf of the United States shall make payment for stock and paid-in surplus of such bank and such payment shall be subject to call in whole or in part by the board of directors of the bank, with the approval of the Governor."

The following committee amendments were read and agreed to:

Page 11, line 14, strike out "2" of the Agricultural Credit Act, approved March 4, 1923, and insert "205 of the Federal Farm Loan Act."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 3 to offer a short amendment.

Mr. JONES. With the understanding that no other amendment will be offered, I will not object.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lieu of the committee amendment on page 3, lines 2, 3, 4, and 5, insert "but the rates of compensation for the performance of the duties of the respective offices and positions under the corporation shall not exceed the rates prescribed for comparable duties by the salary schedules of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREENWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6670) to provide for the establishment of a corporation to aid in the refinancing of farm debts, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. BOILEAU rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. BOILEAU. For the purpose of offering a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman against the bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is any gentleman on the committee opposed to the bill, or does any other gentleman opposed to the bill desire to offer a motion to recommit? There being no response, the Clerk will report the motion to recommit offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOILEAU moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture, with instructions to that committee to report the bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That this act shall be known by the title 'The Farmers' Farm Relief Act.'

"SEC. 2. That the Government now perform its solemn promise and duty and place American agriculture on a basis of equality with other industries by providing an adequate system of credit, through which farm indebtedness and farm mortgages now existing may be liquidated and refinanced, through real-estate mortgages on the amortization plan, at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal per annum, and through mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes at 3-percent interest per annum through the use of the machinery of the Federal farm-loan system and the Federal Reserve Banking System.

"SEC. 3. The Federal Farm Loan Board is hereby authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making real-estate loans, secured by first mortgages on farms, to an amount equal to the fair value of such farms and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, through the use of the machinery of the Federal land banks and national farm-loan associations, and to make all necessary rules and regulations for the carrying out of the purposes of this act with expedition. In case such farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness to be liquidated and refinanced exceeds the fair value of any farm and 50 percent of the value of insurable buildings and improvements thereon, then such farm mortgages and indebtedness shall be scaled down in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States', approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto. Such loans shall be made at a rate of 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal per annum, payable in any lawful money of the United States.

"SEC. 4. The Federal Farm Loan Board is further authorized and directed to liquidate, refinance, and take up chattel mortgages and other farm indebtedness, existing at the date of enactment of this act, by making loans at the rate of 3-percent interest per annum, secured by first mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes, to an amount equal to 65 percent of the fair market value thereof, such loans to run for a period of 1 year, with right of renewal from year to year for a term of 10 years: Provided, That any depreciation in the value of such livestock is replaced by additional livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes, and the amount of the loan is reduced 10 percent each year.

"SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, $100,000 for the use of the Federal Farm Loan Board to carry out the provisions of this act. The necessary and actual expenses incurred in carrying out the provisions in this act shall be apportioned and prorated and added to each individual mortgage, and such sums so added shall be paid to the Federal Farm Loan Board for administrative purposes.

"SEC. 6. The funds with which to liquidate and refinance existing farm mortgages and other farm indebtedness shall be provided by the issuing of farm-loan bonds by the Federal farm loan system, through the Federal Farm Loan Board and Federal land banks, as now provided by law, which bonds shall bear interest at the rate of 1½ percent per annum, if secured by mortgages on farms, and 3 percent per annum if secured by chattel mortgages on livestock used for breeding or agricultural purposes. These bonds, after delivery to the Federal Farm Loan Board, may, by it, be sold at par to any individual or corporation, or to any State, National, or Federal Reserve bank, or to the Treasurer of the United States. And it shall be the duty of the Federal Reserve banks to invest their available surplus and net profits, after the dividends are paid to their stockholders, in such farm-loan bonds. Such profits to include the franchise tax now paid to the United States.

"SEC. 7. In case all of said farm-loan bonds are not readily purchased, then the Federal Farm Loan Board shall present the remainder to the Federal Reserve Board, and the Board shall forthwith cause to be issued and delivered to the Federal Farm Loan Board Federal Reserve notes to an amount equal to the par value of such bonds as are presented to it. Such farm-loan bonds to be held by the Federal Reserve Board as security in lieu of any other security or reserve.

"SEC. 8. The Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal land banks shall turn over all payments of interest and principal on such farm-loan bonds, for which the Federal Reserve Board issues Federal Reserve notes, to the Treasurer of the United States, and shall be by him kept for the purpose of redeeming said Federal Reserve notes and reinvested by him as a sinking fund in municipal or State bonds and bearing interest at the rate of at least 2 percent per annum, both principal and interest to be paid in any lawful money of the United States.

"SEC. 9. Whenever the amount of money actually in circulation in the United States shall exceed $75 per capita, then the Treasurer of the United States, by and with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board and the President of the United States, may retire Federal Reserve notes in an amount equal to the principal paid on farm-loan bonds, for which Federal Reserve notes were issued, not to exceed 2 percent in any 1 year, of the amount of Federal Reserve notes so issued.

"SEC. 10. There is hereby created a Board of Agriculture consisting of one member from each State, elected by the farmers of such State, who shall be elected by delegates selected by a mass convention of farmers in each county or parish within the United States, who are indebted and declare it to be their intention to take advantage of this act, such county or parish convention to be its own judge as to who are bona fide farmers and otherwise eligible to participate in its proceedings.

"SEC. 11. The Federal Farm Loan Board is hereby authorized and directed to give public notice, through the Federal land banks, to the farmers of each county or parish of the time and place of holding the first county or parish convention, which shall be held at the seat of government of each county or parish; and it shall at the same time give notice of the first convention of the State delegates, to be held at the State capital of each State, notice of such convention to be given within 60 days after the enactment of this act.

"SEC. 12. The farmers attending such county or parish convention and the State delegates attending such State convention shall organize and make such rules and regulations for their procedure as they deem necessary or convenient, and shall elect a president and a secretary and make arrangements for such other and future conventions as they may deem necessary to carry out the purpose of this act, and they shall at all times cooperate and assist the Board of Agriculture, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the Federal land banks, and national farm-loan associations to liquidate and refinance farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

"SEC. 13. The State delegates so elected shall meet at the State capitals of their respective States and elect a member of the Board of Agriculture, who shall hold his office from the date of such election and for a period of 2 years from January 20 following, and who shall receive $15 per diem and necessary traveling expenses while on official business, to be paid by the Federal Farm Loan Board out of any funds set apart by section 5 of this act.

"SEC. 14. Immediately after their election the members of the Board of Agriculture, upon call of the Federal Farm Loan Board, shall meet at Washington in the District of Columbia, and organize by electing a chairman and a secretary, and they shall make such rules and regulations as they deem necessary and expedient to carry out the purposes of this act. They shall elect an executive committee of three, none of whom shall be members of the Board of Agriculture, who shall hold their office at the will of said board, and who shall receive a salary of $7,500 per annum, and 5 cents per mile for necessary traveling expenses while on official business, to be paid by the Federal Farm Loan Board out of any funds set apart by section 5 of this act.

"SEC. 15. The members of the Board of Agriculture shall keep in touch with and report to the executive committee the progress of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness in their respective States. They shall cooperate with county or parish and State governments, and with all farm and cooperative organizations within their respective States, to speedily bring about the liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness.

"SEC. 16. The executive committee of the Board of Agriculture shall advise with and supervise the work of liquidating and refinancing farm mortgages and farm indebtedness by the Federal Farm Loan Board and the Federal Reserve Board, and they shall cooperate with said Boards and with county or parish and State governments and with the various farm organizations, and with the agricultural colleges of the Nation, in order to bring about a just and speedy liquidation and refinancing of farm mortgages and farm indebtedness. They shall report any member of the farm loan system or the Federal Reserve Board who neglects, hinders, or delays the carrying out of the provisions of this act, to the President of the United States, and it shall be the duty of the President, upon cause shown, to remove any such officer and to appoint some other suitable person in his place with the advice and consent of the Senate.

"SEC. 17. The benefits of this act shall also extend to any farmer, or member of his family, who lost his farm through indebtedness or mortgage foreclosure since 1919, and who desires to purchase the farm lost or another farm. It shall also extend to any tenant, or member of his family, who desires to purchase a farm, provided he has lived on and operated a farm as a tenant for at least 3 years prior to the enactment of this act.

"SEC. 18. The executive committee of the board of agriculture shall have power in case of crop failures, and in other meritorious cases, to extend the time payments due on loans made under this act from time to time for a period not exceeding 3 years, provided the mortgagor keeps up the payment of all taxes on the mortgaged property.

"SEC. 19. This act shall be liberally construed, and no technicalities or limitations shall be imposed or permitted to interfere with the speedy carrying out of its purposes; and the provisions of the Federal farm-loan system and the Federal Reserve Banking System shall apply as far as applicable in the carrying out of the provisions of this act; and all laws or parts of laws in conflict herewith are for the purpose of this act repealed. The persons charged with the duty of carrying out the provisions of this act are authorized and directed to do all things necessary or convenient to accomplish its purposes with expedition.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to recommit is not germane to the bill. It provides a separate system of financing and the issuance of currency, an altogether different philosophy from the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BOILEAU. No.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls attention to the opinion of the present Speaker delivered on April 13, 1933, Seventy-third Congress, first session, at which time this same question arose and was then decided by the present occupant of the chair. The Chair sustains the point of order for the reason given in that opinion.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House who have spoken on this measure have 5 legislative days within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOULKES. Mr. Speaker, the important feature of this bill relates to its provisions for guaranteeing the principal by the Government of the land-bank bonds issued for the refinancing of farm mortgages as a part of the Farm Credit Administration, the interest thereon having been guaranteed in the original bill.

I am opposed to the general principle involved, but shall support it as part of the administration program and for the further reason that I am quite conscious of the fact that the bill will pass regardless of any objections I may offer. I want to take this occasion to thank the Chairman of the Agriculture Committee, Mr. MARVIN JONES, and the other members of long standing for their kindness and forbearance accorded me, a new member, during the many months we have labored together in an attempt to bring about relief to the agricultural communities throughout the country.

It is useless for me to take your time in describing these conditions so well understood by the committee members, other than to say that we were and still are passing through the most perilous period in our country's history—more perilous even at this moment than some of us apprehend. To do so may bring a sense of terror and it may be best that the multitudes of our people should remain unconscious of these conditions. We are notoriously a good-hearted people. False and dangerous proposals usually approach us through our sympathies, our good will. It is one thing to abolish poverty; to fill the land with plenty; to secure everybody's old age from distress. When these schemes are being presented for consideration, we are all eager to enlist in the cause; but sometimes it so happens that when the methods by which these ends are to be achieved are investigated, we do not have to look far to find the poison in the bait.

The refinancing of farm debts under the so-called "Farm Loan Act" was legislation that was very near and dear to me. Being a farmer myself, whose associations and friendships are almost entirely among that class of people, I entertained a deep and abiding hope that at last we had arrived at the day when these men and women who labor on the soil would receive their just share of the new deal.

At my own expense I have maintained three offices within the confines of my congressional district where we have labored incessantly, day and night, in an effort to assist the long line of farmers who, in their confusion and misery, are constantly knocking at my doors. This has been a great privilege for me to render this service to my fellow men who have been so unjustly neglected in the administration of this act. There have been several causes for this maladministration, the principal one being an unfortunate selection of the officials occupying the high places in the administration program. Many of these men were out of sympathy with its policies, reactionary in their methods, and inefficient in their qualifications.

Today our strategy is to fix our eyes once again upon the money changers who we have been so blithely told, were at last "diven from the temple gates." I had hoped this statement was true; I fear it is not. I sometimes wonder if these men realize how profoundly their official actions affect the economic factors which determine the qualifications and temper of the lives of our distressed people. Even in prosperous times it exercises a dictatorship over us unequaled by anything else. Under present conditions it determines our personal status in our own communities; the educational opportunities of our children; it rules every precious hour of our day, and in the twilight hour it designates the kind of home to which men return from their daily task. It is the one factor that enters into every minute interest of our business and family life, and calls for a sympathetic understanding and a kindly administration of public affairs. I regret being compelled to state that this policy has not been carried out by the Federal land bank in my State or in the States of Minnesota and Dakota, where I have made personal investigations at much loss of time and expenditure of money. With these brief remarks I will now endeavor to proceed to a discussion of this bill with special reference to the past methods of administering the original bill.

Every Member of this House from an agricultural State can visualize the number of homes lost under foreclosure proceedings since last we met. I have no hesitancy in saying that many of these losses have occurred by reason of inefficiency and arbitrary rulings and actions of the land-bank officials and their subordinate officers in the field. You cannot bring this work to a successful enterprise with men who through lack of sympathy with its plans are, therefore, incapable of rendering impartial judgment. If you should appropriate the entire resources of the country to relieve our distressed people, the plan, nevertheless, will be a failure if not properly administered. As an illustration, in the State of North Dakota the chain banks have almost the entire control of this work. Nearly all of them have been or are now in the hands of receivers because of mismanagement and a reckless disregard of prudent banking methods. As a matter of fact, these banks are now largely operated and controlled by the system of branch banking, and many of the officials of the closed banks are now in charge of the branch banks and have control of the refinancing of farm mortgages, which they so unwisely accepted. These officials have not only been placed in control of the Federal land-bank business, but their endorsements of minor officials, such as field men and appraisers, have been followed by the appointing power resulting in a most unwise procedure, in that they are now called upon to act as judge, prosecutor, and jury on their own misdeeds and are, therefore, able to refinance their comparatively worthless mortgages in exchange for cash, based on land-bank bonds whose interest was guaranteed by the Government and for which they are now asking you to also guarantee the principal. I know of numerous instances where these loans have been made, where the land offered as security could have been purchased for much less than the loan amounted to. This is not my conception of good business methods. It does not help the farmer. It merely safeguards and reimburses the money lender and saddles the distressed farmer with additional obligations, which he can never pay.

These same banks were carrying heavy chattel loans, largely secured by livestock, no longer in existence, and farm machinery, long since worn out. It is a crime to take these loans over in exchange for bonds guaranteed as to both principal and interest. Under this system the banker gets his pound of flesh, but no relief comes to the man on the land. This condition is largely due to the lack of farmer representation in these Federal set-ups, the entire personnel of which should be in the hands of its friends.

I have received hundreds of complaints that applications for loans had been filed and forwarded to the St. Paul Land Bank from which no word had ever been received. I am reliably informed that the mismanagement and confusion were so great there, that they were even unable to locate these applications and that a large number were found scattered around on the floor and among the waste-paper, where they had presumably laid for some months. During all this time these applicants and their families were being foreclosed upon and evicted from their homes. A terrible condition which calls for no further comment on my part. Again the selection of hundreds of inexperienced young men from so-called "agricultural schools" who lacked that quiet demeanor and broad experience so necessary for their work—these young men, suddenly placed in authority without any corresponding responsibility, have done much harm. Their eyes aflame with the light of a political pull, they have conducted themselves in such a manner as would naturally be expected to emanate from such a source. They are an eyesore and a menace to the land owner seeking relief from the much-tooted advantages of the Farm Credit Administration Act. Who can blame these farmers for adopting those methods and specialized weapons which are best suited to their own defense?

This benevolent legislation, intended to relieve our distressed people, has been thrown to its enemies to administer and has resulted in perpetuating one of the worst bureaucracies that has ever existed. When the duly elected representative of the people raises his voice in behalf of his constituency, this motley crew resolves itself into an organized movement to slander and besmirch him; and when these complaints are presented in proper form to the Governor and Commissioner of the Farm Credit Agency in Washington, he is curtly told they are without merit. This is representative government with a vengeance.

The Farm Credit Administration should be removed from the control of self-appointed farm leaders, whose lobbyists have and still are exploiting the helpless large majority of farmers, whose voices are still unheard and silent in this nefarious set-up.

In my own State, Michigan, the administering of this act is a farce. It is in the hands of its enemies, and no good can possibly come of it. We farm members who have supported every administrative measure regardless of our own personal opinions on the assumption that we should support the policies and measures of our great President and that we should submerge ourselves for the advancement of the general good by following his leadership are becoming disgusted with the Farm Credit Administration and its satellites. In behalf of these farmers I am here.

We demand that this act be administered by its friends and in the manner anticipated by this Congress when it authorized this relief measure. The statement made here by the chairman to the effect that these loans are being handled in a satisfactory manner is not a true statement insofar as Michigan is concerned, and my investigation in Minnesota and North Dakota does not substantiate that statement.

Much could be said against guaranteeing both the principal and interest on these bonds. However, my chief concern at this time is to get these loans made under the most advantageous circumstances to the farmers. Hence, I will not criticize this feature of the bill. What we need now is sympathetic action, and this cannot be had until we make a clean sweep of the old reactionaries still in power, playing the same old partisanship game and still handing their favors to those who need it the least.

Frankly, I am unable to conceive any legitimate reason why we should continue to pay a high rate of interest to the select few into whose hands these bonds will go while we have pending in this House a bill known as the "Frazier bill" but which for some reason we are unable to get through the committee or bring up on the floor.

In my own judgment this Frazier bill offers the solution for many of our farm-loan ills; and while perhaps it does not contain all of the saving grace that its sponsors may claim for it, it nevertheless is preferable to the bill now before us. My immediate objective is to get these loans made and made now, regardless of too close a scrutiny of the methods employed or the legislation enacted.

Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, let me emphasize in all sincerity that this farm-credit agency hierarchy should be driven out and replaced by the friends of those to whom the legislation was intended to bring relief. This measure was designed to refinance our distressed farmers and not as means to remunerate doubtful banking methods, or provide employment for inexperienced graduates or harebrained professors who lack that broad worldly experience so necessary to its sympathetic and practical operation.

Mr. Chairman, I have supported this administration in every measure; I regret the necessity for voicing these criticisms of the Federal land bank and Farm Credit Administration. I feel that many of the gentlemen in high authority do not possess a practical understanding of the plight of our farmers. It is desperate at this time. The agricultural communities are our friends. They are looking forward to us and the new deal to fulfill our promises and lighten their burdens. If we bring this about, they will remain our friends forever. [Applause.]

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I obtained unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a news release by Mr. Goss, the Federal Land Bank Commissioner. I now ask unanimous consent to include with his statement a copy of the charges that I filed against the Appraisal Division with the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman wants to indict his own party, I have no objection to it.

Mr. TRUAX. It is the Republicans who have the Appraisal Division.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TRANSFER OF GOLD FROM THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS TO THE TREASURY—REFERENCE OF A BILL

The SPEAKER. There is on the Speaker's desk a message from the President of the United States providing for the transfer of gold from the Federal Reserve banks to the Treasury of the United States, and providing also for the method of regulating the number of grains of gold in a dollar. A bill has been introduced to carry into effect the suggestions of the President in his message, by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. It is contended that inasmuch as the Banking and Currency Committee was called to the White House and the message which is now on the Speaker's desk read to the members of that committee for their suggestions, and that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was not called, and inasmuch as the bill has been handed to the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee for introduction; also, inasmuch as the Goldsborough bill, which was first introduced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] in the Sixty-seventh Congress and which has been introduced in each Congress from that time until the present has been referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, that therefore this particular message and this bill ought to be referred to the Banking and Currency Committee.

The bill introduced by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH for so many Congresses and so ably discussed by him on the floor is a bill to stabilize the purchasing power of money, and his bill used gold as its base. That bill has never been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee. A controversy has arisen between the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and the Committee on Banking and Currency as to which committee ought to have this bill and this message, and it devolves upon the Speaker of the House to make the reference.

The Speaker could submit the matter to the House and escape responsibility, but he does not desire to do that. The Chair wants to take all the responsibilities that go with his office. So the Speaker is going to decide the question.

It is a matter of great importance, and at my request the Parliamentarian has assembled the authorities. I am indebted also to other Members of the House for suggestions. The Chair intends now to incorporate in the RECORD in full various decisions and precedents on this important subject.

Originally in the House of Representatives there was only one committee. It was the Committee on Ways and Means. That committee was created as a select committee in 1789. All other committees created since that time have been created for the purpose of taking away from the Ways and Means Committee some of its burdens. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was created in 1864. It is an older committee than the Committee on Banking and Currency. The debates at the time the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures was established does not indicate with any definiteness the functions the committee should exercise. The House at that time evidently thought that the title given to the committee was sufficiently clear to indicate the jurisdiction of the committee.

The Committee on Banking and Currency was created for the express purpose of relieving the Ways and Means Committee of a number of its duties.

Precedents have been numerous. As far back as 1873 the bill which demonetized silver by omitting that character of coinage from the list of coins published was a bill essentially, among other things, to regulate the gold content of the dollar.

The gold content of the dollar has been changed several times in the history of the United States, and bills which effected changes in the gold content of the dollar have, without a single exception, insofar as the Chair is advised or has been able to ascertain, come from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The fact that a committee was called to the White House to hear a message read on this subject does not give to that committee, of itself, jurisdiction of the message or of any bill which might be introduced for the purpose of carrying the message into effect. Neither can a committee be given jurisdiction by handing a bill to the chairman of a committee with the request that he introduce it.

The decisions are perfectly plain and there are many of them. The act of March 14, 1900, also fixed the standard unit of value of the dollar at 25.8 grains of gold, nine tenths fine. This was not considered by any committee of the House. The debates on the bill indicated that an informal committee had investigated and considered this particular subject, which was finally embodied in a bill which was prepared during the recess preceding the first session of the Fifty-sixth Congress. The bill was brought before the House under a special rule which provided an entire week for the consideration of the measure. In the preceding Congress—the Fifty-fifth—several bill were introduced relating to the fixing of a standard unit of value. Those bills were considered by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. One of them, H.R. 11917, was reported to the House.

It would seem that the act of March 14, 1900, was based, to some extent, upon the report of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the Fifty-fifth Congress.

The act of May 26, 1906, amending the act of March 14, 1900, with respect to gold coinage and gold certificates, was reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The act of May 26, 1906, was the bill, S. 6022, which was considered and reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

It is interesting to note in this connection that the act of March 8, 1911—Senate bill 10457, Sixty-first Congress, third session—which amended the act of March 14, 1900, was considered and reported by the Committee on Ways and Means. The act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon"—House bill 5381, Fifty-first Congress, first session—was considered and reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 4093, lists a number of bills relating to the coinage of silver and the purchase of bullion which were considered by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

There seems to have been a conflict between the Committee on Banking and Currency and the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures as far back as 1882, with respect to an issue of silver certificates. On December 6, 1882, the House referred that part of the President's message relating to the issue of silver certificates to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, however, in 1884, reported a bill relating to the exchange of silver certificates of large denominations, into ones of smaller denominations.

It will be found that in the jurisdictional fight over the subject of silver bullion and silver certificates, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures usually succeeded in acquiring jurisdiction.

And then in the Sixty-seventh Congress the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] introduced a bill which had for its purpose stabilizing the purchasing power of money, to which the chairman has already referred, and which, together with the other matters to which the Chair has called attention, it is contended entitled the Committee on Banking and Currency to the consideration of this particular bill.

It becomes necessary to look into the character of the bill which has been introduced, and the Chair will put a statement in the RECORD which seems to have been an analysis of the bill. With his usual care and accuracy of expression, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, analyzed the bill. The analysis made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], which the Chair does not seem to have here, but which, without objection, the Chair will incorporate at this point as a part of his opinion in this matter, is so clear that the Chair will not undertake to analyze the bill.

Analysis of the bill to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock, and for other purposes

1. Transfers to the United States the ownership and possession of all Federal Reserve bank gold (including that held by the Federal Reserve Board and Federal Reserve agents) and provides for payment therefor in gold certificates.

2. Authorizes the Federal Reserve banks to maintain reserves against Federal Reserve notes entirely in gold certificates.

3. Clarifies the Government's power to regulate the acquisition, transporting, melting, or treating, import, export, or earmarking of gold.

4. Provides forfeiture of gold withheld, acquired, transported, melted, or treated, imported, exported, or earmarked in violation of this bill or regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, and also a penalty equal to twice the value of the gold.

5. Provides that no gold shall hereafter be coined, and that no gold coin shall hereafter be paid out or delivered by the United States and that all gold coin of the United States shall be withdrawn from circulation and formed into bars. There is provision for releasing gold bars to pay foreign balances, and for industrial, professional, and artistic uses, and for other purposes not inconsistent with the bill.

6. Provides that no currency of the United States shall be redeemed in gold except to the extent permitted in regulations issued by the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President but that gold certificates owned by Federal Reserve banks shall be redeemed at such times and in such amounts as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury are necessary to maintain equal purchasing power of every kind of currency of the United States and that the reserve for United States notes and for Treasury notes of 1890 and the security for gold certificates shall be maintained in gold bullion equal to the dollar amounts required by present law.

7. Establishes a method of accounting for the gain or loss in value of Treasury gold occasioned by any change in the weight of the gold dollar.

8. Clarifies present laws which authorize the purchase and sale of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury.

9. Establishes a stabilization fund and appropriates $2,000,000,000 for the purpose, but only out of the profits on devaluation, which are directed to be covered into the Treasury under the bill; and provides that the President shall cause an audit to be made of such fund and a full report thereof to be included in the next succeeding annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

10. Limits the President's power to fix the weight of the gold dollar to weights between 50 and 60 percent of the present weight, and makes it clear that his various powers under paragraph (b) (2) of the Thomas amendment are continuing and distinct.

11. Approves and confirms action taken by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of March 9, 1933, and sections 43 and 45 of the act of May 12, 1933.

The analysis clearly shows that the bill deals solely with gold. It shows that it is a coinage bill, in the judgment of the Chair, and that it ought to go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The Chair desires to read from a brief submitted by the gentleman from New York, Mr. O'CONNOR, which is so clear on the point that the Chair proposes to read a portion of it. The Chair hopes the gentleman will pardon the Chair for mentioning his name.

In the Forty-fifth Congress, RECORD, page 232, a bill to authorize the coinage of the silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character was referred to the committee (that is, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures). On a point of order made by Mr. Alexander H. Stephens on a motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency the House voted that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, basing its decision on a precedent of 1873, when that committee reported a bill providing for the coinage of a special kind of silver dollar. In the Forty-eighth Congress, RECORD, page 1057, on motion of Mr. Richard P. Bland, sustained by a vote of the House, the House transferred from the Committee on Banking and Currency to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a bill to provide for the retirement of the trade dollar. In the Fifty-first Congress, RECORD, page 303, so much of the President's message as referred to the purchase and coinage of silver was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The committee has reported bills for the coinage of silver, a bill authorizing the issuance of Treasury notes of deposits of silver bullion, a bill to retire and recoin the trade dollar, bills establishing mints and assay offices, bills relating to the exchange of gold coins for gold bars at the mint, a bill concerning the coinage of $3 gold pieces, a bill concerning the exchange of coins, a bill relating to supply of subsidiary coins, and a bill relating to the issuance and deposit of minor coins.

All these bills were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

In the Fifty-fifth Congress, Report No. 1876, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures reported a bill to define and fix the standard of value and to regulate coinage and provide for redemption thereof. In the Fifty-seventh Congress, Reports No.

260 and No. 1180, the committee (the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures) reported a bill relating to Hawaiian silver coinage and silver certificates.

The Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], a member of that committee, joined in the preparation of a brief which is an able presentation of the rights of that particular committee in this matter. Without objection, and without reading any part of it, the Chair will incorporate the brief in the opinion at this point:

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with your suggestion, we hereby submit our written memorandum setting forth the reasons that H.R. —— should be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. We assume that you will be largely guided in the decision you reach by the precedents heretofore established by the House of Representatives in defining the jurisdiction of our committee. We will, therefore, refer you to certain precedents which establish the proposition that all bills dealing primarily with the subject matter of fixing the value of the gold dollar or its contents in weight and fineness, and all bills dealing with the acquisition of gold or silver and the payment therefor in gold or silver certificates and properly and traditionally referable to our committee. This, we do not think, the members of the Banking and Currency Committee can dispute successfully.

In 1892 our committee reported a bill relating to Hawaiian silver coinage and silver certificates. On November 3, 1877, Mr. Buckner, of Missouri, introduced a bill to authorize the free coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal tender character. He moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, raised the question of order that the bill should, under the rules, go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The Speaker stated that when there was a dispute as to reference, it was the custom of the chair to submit the question to the House. The House, after debate, in which the precedent of 1873 was cited as a case where our committee had jurisdiction and after it was urged that our committee had the right to fix the value of the basic metal, voted overwhelmingly that the bill should go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. On February 12, 1884, on motion of Mr. Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, and by a vote of ayes 84, noes 34, the House transferred from the Committee on Banking and Currency to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a bill to provide for the retirement of the trade dollar. On December 10, 1890, the resolution distributing the President's message provided for the reference of so much as referred to the purchase and coinage of silver to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. In 1886 our committee reported on a bill for the free coinage of silver. This was also done in 1892, and in 1891 our committee was given jurisdiction of the subject of silver bullion deposits, the bill (H.R. 5381) authorizing the issue of Treasury notes on deposits of silver bullion. This involved directly the question of the acquisition of silver bullion and the payment therefor not with silver certificates but with treasury notes. In 1884 the bill (H.R. 4976) to retire and recoin the trade dollar was properly referred to our committee. On December 6, 1882, the resolutions distributing the President's message referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures the subject relating to the mints of the United States, and on different occasions the committee has reported on bills to establish branch mints and assay offices. The committee has reported on other bills dealing with gold or silver as such.

On January 31, 1899, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures reported H.R. 11917, a bill to define and fix the standard of value and to regulate coinage and provide for redemption thereunder, and for other purposes. This bill provided that the standard unit of value shall, as now, be the dollar and shall consist of 25.8 grains of gold nine tenths fine, or 23.22 grains of pure gold, being the one-tenth part of the eagle, and that all obligations for the payment of money shall be performed in conformity with that standard. This bill contained numerous other provisions, such as the creation of a division in the Treasury Department to keep records and accounts and relating to the issue, redemption, and exchange of the several kinds of United States money. It transferred from the general fund in the Treasury of the United States and took up all the books of said division as a redemption fund the amount in gold coin and bullion held against outstanding gold certificates, etc. It transferred from the general fund in the Treasury of the United States and took up all the books of said division as a reserve fund an amount of gold, in coin and bullion, equal to 25 percent of the amount, both of United States notes and Treasury notes issued under the act of July 14. This reserve was to be held as a common fund and used solely for the redemption of said notes and in exchange for said notes and for silver dollars. The bill made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold-reserve fund taken up on the books of the Division of Issue and Redemption, and for this purpose it was authorized from time to time to transfer to such fund any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue and sell, whenever he deemed necessary, bonds of the United States bearing interest at a rate fixed to accomplish the ends aforesaid. He was authorized to pay out gold coin for gold certificates, pay out United States notes for currency certificates, pay out silver dollars for silver certificates, issue silver certificates for silver dollars, pay out United States notes or Treasury notes in exchange for gold coin.

The bill provided that upon deposit by national banking associations of United States bonds, such associations should be entitled to receive from the Comptroller of the Currency circulating notes of different denominations equal in value to the par value of the bonds so deposited, and under said provisions such national banking associations could receive additional circulating notes, and they were required to pay into the Division of Issue and Redemption a duty specified. The act also amended certain provisions of the National Banking Act of that time, and provided, among other things, that no association should be organized with a less capital than $100,000, and contained other amendments to the Banking Act made necessary by the fixation of the gold dollar.

It must be borne in mind, however, that the primary purpose of that bill was to define and fix the standard of value and the other provisions amendatory of the National Banking Act then in existence were merely incidental to the main object of the bill.

PRESENT BILL

Since the precedents establish beyond any doubt that our committee has jurisdiction over all bills dealing with the valuation of the gold dollar, its weight and fineness, and the purchase of gold or silver, the question then presents itself as to what the primary purpose of the present bill is. It must be obvious to everyone that the primary purpose is not to change our banking and reserve system or our currency. Certain amendments to the Reserve Act are included in the bill, but only because such changes are made necessary on account of the revaluation of the gold dollar. But the primary and fundamental purpose of this bill is to authorize the President to revalue the gold dollar at not more than 60 percent of the present statutory value.

Now, in order to accomplish this main objective, it is necessary for provisions to be made to acquire all gold bullion now held by the Federal Reserve banks and to acquire any and all other gold, domestic or foreign, as may be deemed necessary for the purpose of revaluing the gold dollar. Manifestly this is to be done in order to prevent private interests from profiting on account of the revaluation of the gold dollar to the detriment of public interests. But the provision in the bill amending the Federal Reserve Act and authorizing the acquisition of gold, etc., are merely means to an end, and that end is plainly the revaluation of the gold dollar. It is foolish to contend that this bill deals primarily with currency or banking. No fundamental change is made in the reserve system or the currency of the country. The message of the President clearly proves this statement. The President says, "The foregoing recommendations relate chiefly to gold." It does not say that they relate chiefly to currency or the reserve system but simply to gold. He says, "By making clear that we are establishing permanent metallic reserves in the possession and ownership of the Federal Government, we can organize a currency system which will be both sound and adequate." He does not say that we are by this bill organizing an adequate and sound currency system, but he says that we will be able to do so after we have by this bill established a permanent metallic reserve. He makes it clear that he is not dealing with merely tokens which constitute currency but is dealing with gold as a metallic reserve behind paper or token currency. He makes it clear that he wishes to eliminate the free circulation of gold coins and that in order to do this he wishes to vest in the Government the title to and possession of all monetary gold within our boundaries and keep that gold in the form of bullion rather than in coin. In order to revaluate, which is the primary purpose of the bill, the President seeks to acquire possession of and title to the monetary gold in the United States and through revaluation he hopes to bring about some greater degree of stability of foreign-exchange rates, and the bill seeks to use any profits accruing to the Government on account of revaluation as a stabilization fund.

The President has already submitted to Congress in the past various measures effecting changes in our banking system and in our currency. In this bill he does not seek such changes only insofar as they may be incidental to the main objective of the bill.

It must, therefore, be clear that this is not a banking or currency bill primarily and fundamentally, but rather a bill to define and fix the standard of value and to regulate coinage, and to provide such means and methods as may be necessary to accomplish this purpose.

This committee has never sought to deprive the Banking and Currency Committee of jurisdiction over any bill or bills dealing primarily with banking or currency problems; but when the Banking and Currency Committee undertakes to invade the legislative field of gold-dollar valuation we are compelled to resist such attempts or otherwise disband as a committee.

We, therefore, respectfully urge that, in conformity with unbroken precedents, you refer this bill to our committee for such action as it may see fit to take.

Respectfully submitted.

MARTIN DIES,
Second District of Texas.

NOTE.— In addition to the above precedents we submit the passage by the House in the Seventy-second Congress, of House Resolution 72, authorizing the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures to make a complete study into the monetary system, the effect of the price of silver bullion, and the advisability of calling an international conference for the purpose of discussing stabilization of currency. We also want to call attention to the fact that on March 20, 1933, Mr. DIES, of Texas, introduced a bill to revalue the gold dollar, which was referred by you to our committee and which is now under consideration by the committee.

The Chair thinks that if the bill does not go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the House may just as well disband that committee, for it will never have any jurisdiction unless it be jurisdiction of this kind.

The Chair is going to rule that the bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. [Applause.]

While the Chair has assumed the responsibility of making this decision and has assembled the precedents so that hereafter there may not be as much conflict between these two committees as there has been heretofore, the Chair would be glad to have the House pass upon the question. The Chair has advised the chairmen of both these committees as to what his ruling in the matter was going to be; and the Chair understands that the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], will want to make a motion to refer this bill and this message to his committee and to present this motion to the House.

The Chair now directs that this bill and the message be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and ordered printed. As a matter of fact, the Chair has directed that the physical reference of this bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures be deferred until after the vote on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, to send the bill to his committee.

The opinion of the Chair with these references and these briefs will appear in the RECORD tomorrow morning.

While the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] is not subject to debate if any Member makes the point of order, it is the hope and desire of the Chair that no Member will make the point of order on account of the very great importance of the subject, and that such time as may be agreed upon for debate may be controlled equally by the Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS] and by the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Thereafter, of course, the bill will be physically referred to the committee whose jurisdiction is established by the vote which will be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. In a case of this kind where there is a contest between two committees, each claiming jurisdiction, and the Chair rules that the bill should go to one of the committees, is not the only way that the ruling of the Chair can be overcome is by an appeal from the ruling of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion can be made.

Mr. BLANTON. I just wanted that understood.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving a point of order, which I do not intend to make, as I understand the rule, the motion is made either by unanimous consent or by direction of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. If anyone should desire to make a point of order against the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, made upon his own initiative and without the instruction of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the motion would not be in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is right about that. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], tomorrow morning, immediately after the reading of the Journal, to make the motion, and in the meanwhile the Committee on Banking and Currency can authorize the gentleman to take such steps.

Mr. MAPES. The rule also states that the motion is not in order upon Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has assumed, of course, that Calendar Wednesday business, in order tomorrow, will be dispensed with.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday business, in order tomorrow, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] tomorrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MAPES. I had no objection, but I wanted the RECORD to show the situation.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to suggest to the Chair that the Committee on Banking and Currency does not desire to delay the actual reference of the bill, and it is perfectly agreeable for the Chair to now refer the physical possession of the bill, so there may be no delay.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thanks the gentleman and will now refer the matter to the committee.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that under clause 2 of rule XXIV no debate may be had on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GOSS. Then would not a reservation of a point of order have to be made tonight in order to protect the situation, in the absence of an agreement by the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency with the Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, on a division of time in debate?

The SPEAKER. That can be adjusted tomorrow. The motion has not yet been made. The bill, however, has been referred.

PUBLIC WORKS OF ART PROJECT—ADDRESS BY EDWARD BRUCE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Edward Bruce, secretary to the Advisory Committee to the Treasury on Fine Arts, on the subject "Public Works of Art Project."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mrs. Reed, members and guests of the Cosmopolitan Club, thank you for asking me to talk to you this evening about the Public Works of Art Project. I want to tell you briefly what the Public Works of Art Project is, how it is being carried on, what I know it means to the artists, and what I hope and believe it may mean to our country.

In November the Public Works Administration, out of the funds it had received from Congress, transferred $400,000,000 to the Civil Works Administration, which is administered by Mr. Harry L. Hopkins, to be used to put people to work throughout the United States. Nearly a hundred projects have been set up under the Civil Works Administration to employ people in a wide variety of undertakings. Over 4,000,000 people are actually at work along a wide front, carrying on a variety of construction enterprises, health plans, surveys, eradication of animal and plant diseases and pests, etc.

While the immediate problem may seem to be the substitution of employment for relief, the results which are being accomplished under this far-flung plan will, I believe, in the long run, show the expenditure to be a thoroughly sound investment not only in the amazing improvement it has made in the morale of our people but in the actual results gained through the projects undertaken.

Time does not permit me to make any survey of these projects, and I am going to confine myself to one of them which, I believe, in the long run, may prove to be the most significant, and that is the Public Works of Art Project.

This project has been set up under the Treasury Department by a grant from the Civil Works Administration to the Treasury Department of $1,039,000. It is estimated that this amount will carry the work forward for 2 months. It is my hope and belief that the results produced during these 2 months will amply justify the continuation of the project for an additional period. The administration of the project is under the immediate jurisdiction of Mr. L. W. Robert, Jr., the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who has charge of practically all of the Federal construction carried on by the Government throughout the United States. Its objective is to employ 2,500 artists at craftsmen's wages varying from $26.50 to $42.50 a week in executing works of art for the embellishment of public buildings and parks. Any building or structure or park which is in whole or in part supported by taxes—Federal, State, or municipal—can be decorated under this program.

To assist Secretary Robert in carrying on the work he has appointed an Advisory Committee to the Treasury on Fine Arts, of which Mr. Frederic A. Delano is the chairman. This committee, with Mr. Robert, are acting as general advisors to the project. A central staff has been organized in Washington with Mr. Forbes Watson as technical director, and Mr. Edward Rowan, of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, as assistant technical director, and a very competent business staff to supervise the rather complicated business procedure of paying the artists throughout the United States and meeting the various expenses incident to the project.

Our purpose in setting up the project has been to decentralize it as far as possible and to secure a group of people to operate it of such catholicity of taste as to insure an opportunity to all worthy artists, regardless of their school, their type of painting, or their affiliation, for employment under the project. To do this we have set up 16 regional committees throughout the United States, the headquarters of which are at Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Washington, Atlanta, New Orleans, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Chicago, Denver, Santa Fe, Dallas, Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Portland. Certain territory has been allotted to each of these committees so as to cover the entire United States, and subcommittees under the regional committees are being set up in the States in which a regional committee is not located. Some 500 men and women have volunteered for service on these committees. Practically without exception every director of the art museums throughout the United States is a member of one of the committees, the remaining members being made up of people of wide cultural interests and special knowledge of the arts. It has been our general policy not to ask artists or sculptors to serve on the committees. Our reason for this was, first, that we did not want to prevent any artist from securing employment under the project by reason of being on the committee; and, second, because of the fact that any artist who truly is an artist is necessarily an individualist—if he doesn't believe in his own pictures, he shouldn't be painting. It is almost inevitable that he primarily likes best the work which is in line with his own views. Art is an expression of national culture, and it takes artists of all schools and types to make this expression a rounded one; we have, therefore, endeavored to make the personnel of our committees such as would insure the utmost breadth of vision in selecting the artists.

Every man and woman in the United States who is an artist, aspires to be an artist, or thinks he is an artist, has available, within reasonable reach of where he is living, a group of completely disinterested voluntary workers to whom he can make application for employment. These committees are guided in the selection of artists by the sole tests that in the opinion of the committee he or she is genuinely and seriously an artist and is out of employment.

The utmost freedom is being given to the artist in the selection of subjects to be painted or sculpture to be done. We have set up, as the general subject of the art to be done, the American scene in all its phases.

Such, briefly, is the general outline of the plan.

It is, so far as I know, the first time in history that there has been a genuinely democratic movement started for the employment of the artist and the support of the arts. Art, in the past, has been under the patronage of the aristocrat or the oligarch. It has been carried on to aggrandize the great or the near great and at their expense or by the great religious oligarchies to glorify their position and incidentally teach their doctrines. It is, I think, significant that religious patronage of art was at its height when church and state were one and languished when they were separated.

In this project a great democracy has accepted the artist as a useful member of the body politic and his art as a definite service to the state. It is, I believe, a distinct setting up of our civilization and a new conception and definition of public works—a recognition that things of culture and of the spirit contribute to the well-being of the Nation.

I do not propose to prophesy either the character or the quality of the art which the 2,500 artists being given employment by our project will produce, but certain things I do know.

There has been too much said about this project as being a relief measure. It is not a relief measure except to the extent that the money is to be spent where it will do the most good, and that is among artists who are out of employment, but the prime test in selecting artists for this work is their qualification and ability as artists.

I can assure you that our records or, to be more specific, our pay rolls are not cluttered with the names of Sunday painters, amateurs, and avocationists. I can assure you that these pay rolls contain the names of a large body of the leading painters and sculptors of this country.

We receive in Washington weekly reports giving us the names and records of the artists employed. I have brought with me one of these reports picked at random from our files, and I will read to you in the order in which they appear the records of some of the artists employed:

John Doe, aged 28, studied at St. Louis School of Fine Arts, 1921; Art Institute of Chicago, 1926; Art Students' League, New York, 1927; has exhibited in numerous museums and has held one-man shows in several cities.

Richard Roe, aged 36, studied at National Academy, Mechanics' Institute, and with Howard Giles; 10 years' experience painting and teaching.

Another artist, aged 50, studied at Cowles School, Boston; Art Students' League, New York; and with E. L. Blumenschein and Leon Gaspard; 21 years' experience.

Another painter studied at Royal Academy at Vienna; 20 years' experience. Has received four awards; aged 41.

Another artist, aged 47, studied 5 years at Art Institute of Chicago; 2½ years, Royal Academy at Munich. Eighteen years in professional painting of landscape and figure, 5 years in mural painting. Represented in permanent collection of several museums.

Another painter studied at Art Institute of Chicago, and 3½ years in Europe; 25 years' experience. Represented in the permanent collections of numerous museums. Has received numerous honors and awards. Aged 49.

Another painter, aged 39, studied at art department University of Kansas, 1912 to 1915. Two years at Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts. More than 2 years in Paris and the south of France. Has exhibited in practically all major museums of the United States and in the Autumn Salon, Paris. Held one-man shows in New York. Has done mural decorations in Colorado Springs and Kansas City. Work owned by Whitney Museum of American Art, New York; Denver Art Museum; California Palace of the Legion of Honor, San Francisco. Prize, International Water Color Exhibition, Art Institute of Chicago; second purchase prize, California Palace of the Legion of Honor, San Francisco.

Another artist, aged 65, studied at Art Students' League, New York; National Academy of Design, New York; Academie Julien, Paris; mural painting, murals in Polk County Courthouse, Iowa; Missouri State Capitol, etc.

Another painter, aged 57, studied in Louisville; at Art Institute of Chicago, Royal Applied Art Schools, Dresden; Royal Academy, Dresden. Has painted for over 30 years.

The names of all of the artists in the above list appear in Who's Who in American Art. I could continue reading to you such a list until I had finished giving you a record of the 1,600 artists now at work under the project. If I told their names I know you would be astonished to realize how many of them you know, and I am positive that it would dissipate any idea that you might have that we are employing those who are uninitiated in the arts and those who play at being artists. We are trying to select with the utmost impartiality, and without regard for schools of art, serious professional workers in the field of art.

I have mentioned the volunteer workers on our regional committees. These men and women are working with such inspired enthusiasm as to prove the effect which this great project has upon those who are not receiving any monetary benefits.

Let me quote again at random from our files: I find a letter from Mr. Jesse L. Nusbaum, director of the Laboratory of Anthropology, that invaluable museum at Santa Fe, the chairman of the regional committee for that district, who says: "Just for your personal information I wish to add that Mr. Chapman and I have devoted our time since before the middle of December, including holidays and Sundays and many evenings, to the art project nearly to the exclusion of any work whatever for the laboratory of anthropology which employs us."

In the files of another regional chairman we find the following: "I am devoting 5 days and evenings a week to this work, an amount of time which the museum is willing for us to give to it, but I must put aside 2 days for museum work."

These quotations from committee reports could be repeated 16 times, and in this connection I wish to state that the inspiration with which our project has fired our voluntary workers has also fired the members of the Washington office not merely on the art side of the set-up but also on the business side. These men keep no holidays. Both committees and their assistants have had their imaginations fired by the high civilizing possibilities of keeping alive the creative forces of this country and stimulating them to still greater efforts which the Government is now cultivating through the Public Works of Art Project.

The artists of the country have responded to this great gesture with the degree of intensity that the sensative and imaginative would be expected to feel. The craftsmen's wages that they are receiving are accepted gratefully as a means of providing their material wants, but to them this movement means far more. They are accepting it as the greatest opportunity that the artists of this or any other country have ever had to show their mettle. As a call to them to make good and to prove that they have something worthwhile to say. As an opportunity to sell themselves to the country. They are meeting the challenge.

I want to read to you a few extracts from the hundreds of letters which we are receiving from the artists. I wish you could read them all.

One artist writes: "It will have a most salutary effect on the artists working on the national project for higher idealism. If the art of our land is to survive, it is certainly the plain duty of those responsible for its development to keep step with our President in his difficult task of guiding us through these dark days."

From another artist: "I am sure that I can vouch for the majority of the men in my profession doing the best work they are capable of, as the true artist is ever more ready to give than to receive. The governmental gesture is splendid and most helpful for the future of art in America."

From another: "This move by the United States Government is, indeed, a noble gesture and will bring many excellent pieces of work by men who never had a chance * * * I am heart and soul behind you."

From another artist: "I am deeply appreciative of the opportunity I am being given and the plan has been a tremendous boon at a time when our prospects are at lowest ebb. Associates of mine also working on the project feel the way I do."

From another artist: "This gesture on the part of the Government, which is, indeed, of Messianic significance in our American life, I believe, is bound to lead to truly fine creative endeavors."

From another artist: "Here's 1 of the 2,500 artists who will do his darndest to make this thing a go. I'll be mighty surprised if you don't get 2,499 more pledges to the same effect."

Another artist writes: "I have just received your very interesting letter. My intense interest in the Public Works of Art Project and its stimulating effect upon the artists here impels me to answer you immediately.

"It is as if, for many of us, an invitation to project ourselves through our work into the highly exciting and stimulating world has broken the walls of our isolation. We are accepting this opportunity as a challenge, and, if I am not mistaken, a most important period of American art is in the making.

"Every artist I have spoken to and whose project I am aware of is so keyed up to the importance of the situation, amounting practically to a revolution for him, that he is, without exception, putting every ounce of his energy and creative ability into his work as never before.

"It is with amazement that I see the electric change that has come over the artists here. I assure you it is not a question of relief here, as some of the artists who are not eligible are rightly envious of this great opportunity.

"As for myself, I hope to do the best painting that I am capable of."

Another writes: "Aside from my personal appreciation of this job, which has made me feel that for the first time I am functioning as a regular worker with a definite place as an artist in the present economic system, I am stirred by the significance of this whole plan of the Public Works of Art Project. It is a grand opportunity for the American artist to show that after all we, too, are hard-working individuals, striving in our way to contribute the finest we see and understand for the life we have around us. I can think of no more secure and profoundly satisfying existence for the real artist than to be given the opportunity to do his work quietly and steadily—from 9 'til 5—with the assurance of a moderate income sufficient to simple needs and with the deep satisfaction that he lives in a country in which the Government so values his work that he can produce his work for the Government to use and distribute as it sees fit."

Another writes: "Briefly, I think it is the finest thing that this country or any country has ever done for its craftsmen, and we are all eternally grateful and will, I am sure, give the best we humanly can to prove to the skeptics that this money is being spent to a purpose and that that purpose is recognized and understood by the artist.

"I am a young man 23 years old, married, and determined to succeed in art.

"In 1931 I sold my work, despite financial crashes, and made a comfortable income of better than $100 a week—and I mention that sum purely as a basis of comparison, and for no other reason.

"I was happy in the work of my choice, not for mercenary reasons, for the money came without particular effort.

"I married, and on the money we had saved, lived until it was exhausted.

"By the close of 1932 I was 'cleaned out.'

"My pictures, which people wanted, but couldn't buy were worthless as a medium of livelihood.

"However, I struggled on, painting as I had always tried to do, for myself and my own satisfaction and not primarily for money.

"Then the banks closed, and at the last, in the face of rapidly accumulating debts I strove desperately to sell my works for whatever I could get.

"Water colors that were better than ones sold 2 years previously for $35 now went for the ridiculous sum of 25 cents and, ironically, I was glad—actually glad to get it.

"It was a losing proposition, however, and finally, with the help of influential friends I secured a job sweeping floors and running an elevator for $9 a week.

"I felt like a millionaire, and when I was given a raise to $13.50, under the N.R.A. I was overwhelmed.

"But this wasn't art. For 7 long months I was too tired and too busy to touch a paintbrush.

"Then suddenly I was 'fired', without warning, and 'pounded the pavements' for 2 weeks in vain; hunting that elusive job—any job.

"Came the C.W.A. Mr. Howard, director of our art institute and representative for district 7, 'lined me up' on this art project, and doubtless saved our home—and, perhaps, our marriage.

"Yes; I've a lot to thank Roosevelt for, and it is appreciated."

I have tried to explain to you as coldly as I could the manner in which the Public Works of Art Project came into being and how it is operating. But from the first moment that this organization began to function one might remain collected but one could not remain cold. It took a little time for the telephone girls in the Treasury Building to stop calling us the advisory committee on finance, and a little time also for some of the Washington reporters to believe that the Treasury was giving shelter to art. But when the telephone began to buzz furiously and the mail began to reach our offices and telegrams from every point in the United States arrived in handfuls we all realized that the project which we had started was setting fire to the country. We could actually feel in Washington the lift this project gave to the artists—I really believe it would be no exaggeration to say to the people as a whole—from its very inception.

You have heard Mrs. Force, the energetic and tireless chairman of the regional committee for New York State and the metropolitan district, tell of the work that is being done here. When I tell you that a corresponding fervor is motivating 15 other regions, covering the remainder of the United States, you will realize what a thrilling and pulsing movement this has really become. Nothing about it, to my mind, is finer than the distinguished devotion which almost half a thousand volunteer workers are giving to this project. From end to end of this land our committees are coordinating this movement without regard to time or trouble into a great national undertaking.

Some years ago Mrs. Bruce and I were spending the summer in Vezelay, the beautiful hill town in Burgundy. Below the town, nestled in the valley, was one of those lovely little French villages you all know called Aquins. When I went there to paint I found that everybody in that village welcomed me most cordially, talked about the beauty of their village, and sought means to make our stay there pleasant and comfortable. I asked one of them why it was that they were so kind to an artist, and she said to me that years before the famous French painter, Pisarro, had spent a year in their village and painted a hundred pictures of it, and that through Pisarro's eyes they had all come to see what a beautiful place they lived in and realizing this had added so much to the happiness of their lives that they wanted to show their appreciation to all other artists who came to visit them. This, to me, is the essence of the service that an artist can render to the people. It is the business of the artist to seek for beauty and record it, and, if through him, others come to see it, and by seeing it, gain that sense of well-being and contentment that beauty gives, he has had his reward.

I hope that this project will be the entering wedge to give to America what Pisarro gave to Aquins.

It has created for this country a new and finer definition of public works. It is, I believe, a step up in our civilization, a wider conception of the services the State can and should render to its people, to give them happiness and beauty along with plumbing and police.

If we can, through this project, develop the love and the wish for beauty, an intolerance for the ugliness in our lives and our surroundings, a demand for slum clearance, a hatred of the utter drabness of the average city and village in this country, especially its outskirts, we may be building better than we know, not only spiritually, but materially. It may form the stimulus and create a demand for an America beautiful, and such a demand is what everyone is seeking to lift us out of the depression. I hope you will all become crusaders for our project. I thank you.

COST OF LIVING STATISTICS AND WAGE CUT—ARTICLE BY ETHELBERT STEWART

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Ethelbert Stewart in the November issue of the Union Postal Clerk entitled "Cost of Living Statistics and Wage Cuts."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Union Postal Clerk, November 1933]

COST OF LIVING STATISTICS AND WAGE CUTS

By Ethelbert Stewart

The use of the cost-of-living figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics for 1918, now 15 years old, is a crime, a fraud, and an outrage when used as an argument or as a basis for reduction of wages in the year 1933.

The use of the word "standard" is, and always has been, unfortunate in connection with this whole business. If by "standard" is meant a fixed, stationary, unchanging physical condition of living, there is no such thing anywhere in the United States, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics never meant to intimate that there was, much less to outline and establish, such a standard. The Bureau of Labor Statistics in 1918 undertook to ascertain statistically how the workers in 92 industrial centers lived and what it cost them to live in the manner they were living. It never said nor meant to indicate that the conditions it found were to be set up as a standard or to be considered even normal, much less ideal. The Bureau's prices are the present prices of the things it found in the homes of 12,096 workingmen's families in 1918. Prices of the things and the kinds of things we bought in 1918 do not matter much in 1933. In a brief presented to Judge Adkins in the arbitration of wage rates for the printers of the District of Columbia on February 22, 1933, I said:

"The cost-of-living indices as put out by the Bureau of Labor Statistics today are based upon standards that no longer exist, and, as far as the individual families are concerned, could not possibly exist. These figures are based upon the situation that was found in a given number of families in 1918. Statistically, the method is sound, and as applied to a whole community it will furnish an acceptable picture until standards of living or social levels change.

"As a matter of fact, the standards of living and social levels have very materially changed since 1918, so that even taken as a community measure the figures leave very much to be desired, even as a social concept, but as applied to a segregated and practically stationary group of identical individuals, it is so misleading as to be actually vicious. It is a perfectly well understood principle, admitted by all statisticians and economists, that the broader and more general your social data the better will be your picture of the social situation as a whole, and the more dangerous it is to apply it to an individual or a segregated group of individuals. This is partcularly true when the application becomes a continuing one, that is to say, carried on over a period of years."

Upon the same occasion I said further:

"The fixed standard of living is perhaps the most vicious fallacy in all the realms of statistical thinking. The Bureau of Labor Statistics never intended for one minute that this survey of 1918 should be used as a basis of computing the cost of living in 1933. It has continued to use this basis because it had no other. It has never had an appropriation to make a more recent survey, and it is no secret matter that that Bureau has warned the public against just such use of these statistics as is being attempted to be made here and that more than once there has been serious discussion of dropping the whole work of collecting the prices because of the necessity of using an obsolete standard as the base. Standards of living follow the volume of income. As wages go up, standards go up. The workers as a general proposition spend all they get and spend it in buying better and better things, living in better and better houses, wearing better and better clothes, on books and things that will improve their intellectual and spiritual status when all the things necessary for physical comfort have been provided; and having become accustomed to this high level of human life, there can be no greater injustice, there can be nothing that could produce greater mental anguish and physical discomfort than to crowd them back into an economic condition which they had outgrown."

I will not keep still; I will not by my silence seem to be a party to an attempt to crowd the American workmen back into the living conditions, into the status, of 15 years ago. If the Bureau of Labor Statistics could make such a survey as it made in 1918 once every 3 years and use the change in prices between these periods in connection with the living conditions it found in the last survey, then I would agree. That is, to a 3-year stretch I would say "Yes", but over a 15-year stretch "No, never."

To show that the Department of Labor and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the very source of and authority for the figures in question, endorse the position here taken in regard to them we quote from the report of JAMES J. DAVIS, the then Secretary of Labor, made to Congress in 1926:

"It is important that there should be a family-budget survey. The one now in use was made in 1918 and 1919 and covers but 12,096 families, as secured from 92 separate localities. That the standard of living of the workers of the United States has greatly improved since 1918 is apparent to every intelligent observer.

This budgetary information is used as a quantitative weighting for all our cost-of-living figures. In other words, the cost-of-living figures mean that if the worker used the same quantity and quality of food, had lived in the same kind of house—that is, if his standards of living were in all respects what they were in 1918 when this budget survey was made—then by applying the prices in 1926 to the quantities and standards of 1918 the difference in cost of living would be such and such a percent. When, however, all or many of the conditions have changed, the weighting factors secured in 1918 become open to reasonable doubt. It is impossible to say how far they are off or in which direction they are off. A new survey should be made, and the geographical limits of the survey should be selected along broader lines. The survey of 1918–19 was started at the behest of the Shipping Board and covered, to start with, 18 ship-building centers. While this was afterwards corrected to a measurable degree by the inclusion of a total of 92 centers, a new survey should be based upon a selection of industrial centers according to the proportion of our working population engaged in the various industries."

In the report of the Commissioner of Labor Statistics for 1927 (p. 30) I said:

"Our cost-of-living surveys are necessarily based upon the quantities consumed as shown by the family budgetary survey now 10 years old. It hardly seems necessary to call attention to the importance of keeping up our cost-of-living surveys and, therefore, to the importance of making them sufficiently up to date. A cost-of-living survey must be based upon a given standard of living; as that standard changes, new surveys must be made to determine what the change in standard is in order to give cost-of-living surveys the accuracy which is essential to their usefulness."

Again in 1928 (p. 67) and in 1929 the same or practically the same statement was made. In 1930, on pages 25 and 26, the matter was gone into more fully, as follows:

"The cost-of-living figures published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics are extensively used in the adjustment of wages in the various industries. Thousands of establishments have entered into agreements with their employees to change their wages, based in general on the changes in cost of living as compiled by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The Budget study, results of which are now used as a basis for weighting various items in computing cost-of-living changes, was made in 1918. It is acknowledged to be very much out of date, and it is believed by many that it does not accurately represent conditions at the present time. Innumerable requests have come to the bureau asking that a new survey be made in order that the basis for computing cost-of-living changes may be representative of present-day conditions.

"In this connection it should also be noted that the proposed survey has a much wider usefulness than that of permitting the correction of the Bureau's semiannual reports on changes in the cost of living. It would also give what is so widely demanded, a picture of just how American wage earners live. No phrase is more frequently used than 'the American standard of living', and on probably no single subject have we so little up-to-date information."

In my report for the year ending June 30, 1931, I said:

"Perhaps no more wide-spread abuse of the Bureau of Labor Statistics figures is to be found in any direction than in this matter of cost of living. For instance, the Bureau's wholesale-price index at present shows the purchasing power of the dollar, all commodities considered and at wholesale prices, to be $1.43; and this is continuously used to show that the cost of living of workers has been reduced accordingly. As a matter of fact, the purchasing power of the dollar of the home retail prices at this time is but $1.16. However, to apply this to the standard of living of 1918 and to use it as an argument for the reduction of wages would be to throw back the standard 13 years and eliminate all the progress that has been made in home comforts during that time. To get some measure of what the standard of living is now as against what it was in 1918 is to perform the necessary service of getting a base to which to apply the purchasing power ($1.16) of the home-maker's dollar."

We especially call attention to the statement that "However, to apply this to the standard of living of 1918 and use it as an argument for the reduction of wages would be to throw back the standard 13 years (now 15 years) and eliminate the progress that has been made in home comforts during that time."

So it will be seen that I have not changed from the opinions I held officially while Commissioner of Labor Statistics.

I never did believe, however, and do not now believe in "cost of living" or "standards of living" as a basis for wage rates. The whole theory and idea grows out of a system of economics utterly lacking in social outlook, and utterly oblivious of human rights. I have hated it progressively with my advancing years. In the arbitration proceedings above mentioned, I referred to this as follows:

"It is not our intention to go into any lengthy discussion of economic theories. Much of our financial and industrial trouble today results from clinging to a system of political economy which defines itself as being the 'science of wealth'. Its wage theory was that labor was a commodity to be secured at the lowest possible price. Its dictum of 'natural wages' was the lowest amount upon which a worker could live and reproduce another worker to take his place when his life ended or his working power was exhausted. In that alleged 'science', the laborer was not considered as a customer or as an integral part of that public for which the political economist was pleading. To the economists of that date trade meant exports. Our present thought on this whole subject of the cost of living in its relation to wages is a hang-over from a day when economics was concerned with producing enough for the people's sustenance and not to this period when the problem is how to distribute the enormous surplus.

"It is the Greeders' Gazette theory of labor, and until it is abandoned there can be no adjustment of our social life with our enormous powers to produce in a machine age.

"In meeting the statement of the figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics as to the cost of living, we wish therefore, first, to say that we repudiate it in toto as a proper element entering into any adjustment of wage rates. The cost of living standards will follow wage standards. Whether a man will wear an overcoat 1 year, 2 years, 3 years, or 5 years will depend upon the wages earned. And to fit his wages to any one of these only perpetuates that standard, ossifies conditions and paralyzes progress."

If there be a possible standard of living, the workers of the United States have not reached it yet. The baby death rate depends upon the income of the father up to a definite point. The health department of the city of Detroit, Mich., reported that the proportion of deaths from all, or any one, of the general diseases in that city depended upon the amount of money the family earned. Even the President's Research Committee on Social Trends says:

"Death rates are still much higher in the lower-income groups than in others. Until a point is reached where the death rate does not vary according to income, it seems paradoxical to claim that wage earners are receiving a living wage."

GOLD DEVALUATION—ARTICLE BY PROF. EDWIN W. KEMMERER

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by Dr. Edwin W. Kemmerer, the Walker professor of international finance at Princeton University, on the question of gold devaluation, in which the doctor does not discuss so much the question of the devaluation of gold as the extent of the devaluation. It is a very informative article.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROFESSOR KEMMERER EVALUATES ROOSEVELT'S MONETARY POLICY—PRINCETON AUTHORITY HOLDS 50- TO 60-CENT RANGE IS TOO LOW—SAYS ONE THIRD SHOULD BE MAXIMUM—ADMITS POLITICAL NECESSITY FOR DEVALUATION

(The writer of this estimate of the monetary policy President Roosevelt disclosed in his message Monday is internationally distinguished as an authority on money. Various foreign countries have enlisted his aid as a "money doctor." He is Walker professor of international finance at Princeton University.)

By Prof. Edwin Walter Kemmerer

PRINCETON, N.J., January 16.—While in a time like this, when healthy economic recovery is being retarded by monetary instability and uncertainty as to the future value of the dollar, any step in the direction of stabilization is to be welcomed. While all the profits realized from any devaluation plan that may be adopted should clearly go to the whole Nation, as represented by the National Government, and should be used exclusively by the Government for making the stabilization plan effective and for paying off the national debt, there are a number of features in the administration's stabilization plan that are open to criticism.

These features include its theory that the country's gold reserves should all belong to the Government instead of to the Federal Reserve banks, its theory of the relationship of silver to stabilization, the implied commodity-dollar feature of the plan, and the very low range of rates between which the administration proposes to stabilize.

It is this last feature of the plan, providing for stabilization between 50 and 60 cents gold, upon which public attention should now be concentrated, and it is to this feature of the plan that this article is devoted.

RANGE HELD TOO LOW

In my judgment, the proposed range of possible stabilization rates is too low and, if adopted, would cause great permanent injustice to the Nation's present creditor classes, who constitute many of the most worthy people and institutions in our country. It would also impose heavy temporary losses on practically all classes of labor.

The gold standard in the United States was actually discontinued early last March, although it was not legally given up until April. February 1933 was accordingly the last month during which we had a simon-pure gold standard in the United States; namely, a standard under which all of our different kinds of money were maintained equal in value, dollar for dollar, with the value of a fixed quantity of gold in a free gold market.

GOLD VALUE STABLE SINCE FEBRUARY

From February 1933 to the present time the value of gold itself, as measured by its purchasing power over goods in gold-standard countries, like France, Holland, Belgium, and Switzerland, has remained practically unchanged. Such changes as we have had, therefore, since February in the value of our American paper dollar are not due to changes in the value of gold itself but to changes in the value of our paper money.

Assuming for the moment, for the sake of the argument, that the present high value of gold in the world's markets will be continued indefinitely—or, in other words, that the present low commodity price level in gold-standard countries has come to stay, except to the extent that there are debasements of gold monetary units—a 60-cent American gold dollar should give us ultimately a general price level 66⅔ percent higher than that of last February and a 50-cent gold dollar should give us ultimately a price level twice as high as that of last February.

PRICE RISE HE ANTICIPATES

Obviously, if we decide to call a 50-cent piece a dollar, soon or late prices will be twice as high as they would be if we were to call a hundred cents a dollar, provided there were no change in the value of the gold itself which these 50 cents or these 100 cents represented.

On the basis of a 60-cent gold dollar, the general price level would ultimately be 56 percent higher than it is now, and 21 percent higher than it was for the so-called "normal" year 1926. Taking the lowest stabilization rate suggested by the President, namely, a 50-cent gold dollar, the general price level would ultimately be about 86 percent higher than it is now, and about 45 percent higher than it was in 1926.

THINKS GOLD WILL DECLINE

In arriving at these conclusions we have assumed that the value of gold itself would continue at the very high level now prevailing. This is very improbable. The present abnormally high value of gold is largely the result of a world-wide clamor for the yellow metal for purposes that amount to practical hoarding throughout the world in a time of universal economic depression. Gold was comparatively stable in value during the 8½ years ending with the crisis of 1929, and, except for the latter half of the year 1920 and the forepart of 1921, the value of gold throughout the world was depreciating most of the time from 1896 up to 1921.

The world is producing more gold now than ever before in its history. For over a generation its stock of monetary gold has been increasing at a much more rapid rate, on the average, than its production of basic commodities. It has, moreover, in recent years been realizing enormous economies in the use of monetary gold and is in position now to use its monetary gold much more efficiently than it ever did before.

THEN LISTS EXPECTED PRICES

There is no evidence of an enduring scarcity of gold; and when we once work our way out of the present depression and begin to use in a normal way the gold we actually have instead of hoarding it, we will find that there is an abundant supply, and that even without any devaluation of gold monetary units at all the commodity price level in gold-standard countries would have returned to what it was during the 8½ years of comparative stability ending with the crisis of 1929.

A return of gold to its 1926 purchasing-power value would mean a decline in the present value of gold by about 22 percent, or a further rise in our general price level of about 29 percent, on this assumption. If we should adopt a 60-cent gold dollar, the general price level after the stabilization plan became finally effective and the world finally worked its way out of the depression, would be approximately 72 percent higher than it is now and 27 percent higher than it was in 1926. On the same assumption, with a 50-cent rate of stabilization, the general price level would be approximately 111 percent higher than it is now and 58 percent higher than is was in 1926.

A price level twice as high as at present would mean a dollar only half as valuable as now, and a price level 111 percent higher than the present one would mean a 47-cent dollar, as compared with our present one; while a price level 58 percent higher than that of 1926 would give us a 63-cent dollar, as compared with the dollar of 1926.

WOULD PRESS TOO HARD ON CREDITORS

On any one of the above assumptions there would be an enormous depreciation in the value of our dollar. This depreciation would go altogether too far in reducing the burdens of the debtor classes (which are admittedly now unduly heavy) at the expense of the creditor classes. People want money only to buy things with; and, if the purchasing power of the dollar is greatly reduced, or, in other words, if the prices of the things people buy are greatly increased, the public suffers proportionately, unless and until their accumulated savings and their incomes rise sufficiently to compensate for the rise in prices.

There are, however, some very important kinds of savings and of income that do not rise at all—or, at least, to any considerable extent—as the value of the dollar declines, or, in other words, as prices and the cost of living rise. And there are other kinds of income that increase when prices and the cost of living increase, but much more slowly. These incomes are laggards, and it takes them a long time to catch up with a rapidly rising cost of living.

THOSE WHO WOULD SUFFER

In the first class—namely, the class representing savings and incomes that do not rise appreciably as the dollar depreciates—inflation imposes a permanent loss on creditors. In this class are such credits as life-insurance policies, of which the amount outstanding in the United States today is over $100,000,000,000; bonds and mortgages, namely, the forms of securities in which are invested much of the endowments of our colleges, hospitals, public libraries, research laboratories, and other public-welfare institutions and of our savings banks; also practically all pensions and annuities.

The owners or the beneficiaries of such credits are the creditors whose capital and income would be permanently reduced by a reduction in the value of the dollar. For these obligations are payable, principal and interest, in a fixed number of dollars, regardless of the value of the dollar. They do not rise like the prices of commodities, of real estate, and of common stock as the dollar depreciates. If the proposed plan is carried through, these people and institutions will suffer permanent losses that will amount to tens of billions of dollars.

It is a significant fact that the face value of the life insurance outstanding in the United States alone is approximately 12 times as great as that of all of the farm mortgages in the country.

WAGE EARNERS ALSO WOULD PAY

The second class that would suffer heavily from such a great reduction in the value of the dollar is our great laboring class, including both skilled and unskilled labor, and our so-called "white collar" working class. Both economic theory and numerous experiences with monetary depreciation in this country and abroad show and show emphatically that when the currency depreciates wages lag behind prices and the cost of living on the rise; and until the price adjustments to the new and depreciated monetary unit have been completed and the laggardly wages have finally caught up to prices, which usually takes several years, the laboring classes suffer.

Their costs of living rise faster than their incomes, while the value of their savings and of their life insurance declines, so that increasing demands are made upon them to make provisions for the inevitable "rainy day." Even when these people have mortgage debts which they can pay off in a less valuable dollar, they frequently find that after they have met the increased current expenses due to the depreciation of the dollar they have even fewer dollars than before for making payments on their mortgages.

ADMITS REDUCTION IS NECESSARY

In view of these facts, the public, in my judgment, should oppose and oppose vigorously such a drastic reduction in the gold content of the dollar as the one which the administration is now proposing. Some reduction is probably a political necessity, but a reduction so great as 50 percent, or even 40 percent, is altogether too large. A reduction of one third would be the maximum that should be considered at all, and the reduction should be substantially smaller than this if politically possible.

The subject is one of momentous importance, involving the welfare of the entire American people for generations to come. And the public should speak out vigorously their judgment in the matter before it is too late.

ALCOHOLIC-BEVERAGE REGULATION IN THE DISTRICT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I have this morning the privilege of discussing House bill 6181, which concerns itself primarily and exclusively with the legal control of the distribution and manufacture of liquor in the District of Columbia, and of making explanation of that measure to the Members of this honorable body. Before proceeding with the explanation as to this all-important bill, I am desirous at this time of availing myself of the opportunity of saying that on yesterday, which incidentally was one of the anniversaries of the birth of the eighteenth amendment, that I listened upon the floor of the Senate with unusual interest to the words which fell from the lips of the senior Senator from the grand old State of Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. I listened, I say, with unusual interest to his remarks, for there is no man who resides within the confines of these United States for whom I have greater respect than I have for my colleague the senior Senator from Texas.

And why? Because I happen to know that the senior Senator from Texas is one man who is sincere and whose convictions are firm relative to the liquor question in the United States; because he has my respect on account of the fact that he is not only politically dry but he is personally dry. It was, indeed, a privilege for me to have the enviable opportunity of listening to my friend from Texas on yesterday, as I did with just as much interest 1 year ago from yesterday on another anniversary of the birth of the eighteenth amendment.

In passing, however, I am desirous of being availed the opportunity at this hour to make answer to some of the statements that were made by my eminent friend. On yesterday he stated that after the enactment of prohibition we experienced a decrease in drunkenness, but in the same speech further on the Senator stated that he would admit in perfect candor and all frankness that the number of people arrested for being drunk had increased since the enactment of the eighteenth amendment, or rather since it was put into effect through the instrumentality of the Volstead Act.

He also made mention of the fact that the old Keeley Institutes of our country, which we had here and there and everywhere, had entirely disappeared. That is true to a very large extent, but I want to say in that connection that their disappearance has been brought about because of the fact that since the enactment of prohibition those who imbibed strong drink and could not withstand the effects thereof, and who were occasioned to secure treatment, have all gone to the hospitals. I believe that investigation by the senior Senator from Texas would reveal to him unquestionably the fact that thousands upon thousands of drinkers from one end of this land to another have been cared for in the hospitals of our country and in the private sanitariums and institutions of various and sundry sorts.

He stated he would rather have the legalized saloon than to have the unlegalized saloon. I want to state in that connection that not many months ago an eminent man who resides within the confines of my State, and whose opinion is not in accord with mine so far as liquor control is concerned, said, "Wherever liquor is sold there is an open saloon." In a sense and to a degree, I am in accord with that judgment. If it, therefore, be true that wherever liquor is sold there is an open saloon, then we have had within the confines of this country over 50,000 open saloons, because during the era of prohibition there were, I state without hesitation and stand subject to contradiction, in this country more than 50,000 places where one could buy liquor.

One of the things that was sought in the repeal of the eighteenth amendment was an opportunity to tax that one and only commodity which for 13 years had remained untaxed. There is another thing in which the repealists of the United States are interested, and that is returning temperance to this land of ours.

Said the senior Senator from Texas: "With prohibition we had the bootlegger." That is true, and I believe the Senator will admit that prohibition brought about the creation of more bootleggers than this country had ever before known.

The Senator from Texas said that prior to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment the records show, as I recall his assertion, that the American people were making consumption of one third less liquor than they did in January of 1920 when the Volstead Act went into effect. I wish to disagree with my eminent colleague. I assert that in my opinion and in the opinion of a great many people in the country the American people have consumed more hard liquor since the advent of prohibition than ever before in its history. That is attributable to two fundamental reasons and two fundamental causes. What were they?

After prohibition went into effect in the country, the mothers and fathers of this land depended upon the law; the mothers and fathers of this land ceased to fight and treat with the evils of liquor. They stopped talking and teaching temperance and sobriety.

The second reason is that when liquor was outlawed and thus placed in the hands of John Barleycorn, that old tax dodger, instead of a nation of drinkers of light wine and beer, the American people became drinkers of strong liquor. I repeat that, in my opinion, the American people, as a whole, have been made drinkers of hard liquor rather than indulging as they did theretofore in beer and light wines.

Finally, my distinguished friend from Texas has stated to you, honorable sirs, that the repeal of prohibition and the elimination of the eighteenth amendment from the Constitution of the United States is attributable to the highly paid propaganda of the liquor interests. I say that he is in error—in error because every fair-minded individual who gives thought to this question of repeal knows that the eighteenth amendment was repealed on account of public opinion. As we all know, no law can survive, no law can remain on the statute books of the country which is not supported by public opinion, and I do not care what law it may be.

The American people as a whole realized that we could not restrict the appetite by law. The American people realized that prohibition had debauched our youth, that it had filled our jails, that it had filled to overflowing our penitentiaries, that it had broken down all respect for law and order, that it had increased our taxes; and that is why the American people repealed the eighteenth amendment. I therefore repeat that the repeal of the eighteenth amendment is not attributable to any dollar or dollars that might have been contributed by anyone.

He says that crime did not increase in proportion to population under prohibition. I desire respectfully to take issue with him there; and, with the permission of this august body, I read from a magazine published by the United States Flag Association, with headquarters in Washington, D.C., the commander in chief of which is James A. Moss, a retired colonel of the Regular United States Army. I quote:

AMERICA'S ANNUAL CRIME BILL

Prevention and punishment of crime, maintenance of jails and penal institutions, loss of property by fraud, or destruction by arson, $13,000,000,000 annually.

Thirteen thousand million dollars!—

Racketeering—America's biggest industry—$15,000,000,000 annually.

Also, it is appalling to observe, according to this report issued by Colonel Moss, of the United States Flag Association, the following items:

Increase in annual murder rate since 1900, 50 percent; increase in prison population since 1926, 50 percent; crimson-handed assassins roaming at large, 120,000; citizens making a living through crime, 400,000.

The number, my friends, is appalling.

Those who have initially interested themselves in the particular bill which I have under discussion—that is to say, the members of the House Committee on the District of Columbia, and likewise the members of Chairman KING'S committee, the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, and the Members of the House of Representatives—have given to this particular bill their thorough and full consideration.

In this bill we have aimed, as far as possible, at returning to the American people at least some semblance of sobriety, some semblance of temperance, all of which was lacking under the era of prohibition; and why? Because under that era some of the youngsters of our country were seeking adventure. It was the smart thing to be able to violate the law, until we had arrived at the point where many, many millions of the American people were violating the law.

I desire to take this opportunity to say that when the eighteenth amendment was passed if there had been enacted there, or in any of the laws passed in accordance therewith, a provision that every single man who purchased liquor in violation of the law should be equally guilty with the seller, the eighteenth amendment would not have stayed in the Constitution for 13 years, and everybody knows that to be a fact. If the purchaser had been made equally guilty with the seller, in the first place, I do not believe the constitutional amendment ever would have passed. In the second place, if it had passed, it would have not long remained a part of the Constitution.

Let us face the facts. I do not believe that in this session of the United States Congress there will come before this great body any question of greater importance than the matter which we have under consideration now. Why? Because, sirs, an endeavor has been made to fashion such a bill as will serve as a pattern and a model from which other cities may, if they choose, fashion their control measures; and in so drafting this bill we have endeavored to give to the people of the District of Columbia the sort of control, the sort of distribution, that will return to the people of the District of Columbia, and that will aid in returning to the people of America, temperance and sobriety.

The bill is liberal. It is liberal in respect of making it no longer fashionable to violate the law. Heretofore it has been the smart thing, it has been the cute thing, it has been the adventurous thing, it has been the devilish thing, it has in some instances been the fashionable thing, to do what? To violate the law—not here, but there, and everywhere. It has been the fashionable thing, it has been the cute, the adventurous thing, to purchase liquor in violation of the law. The liquor has not been out where it could be seen. It has been hidden. It has come from dark alleys and caches. It has been transported to the doors of the people of this country by the bootleggers. I venture the prediction that in years to come it will be the smart thing for the boy or the girl or the mother or the father to be able to say, "I do not indulge in anything intoxicating."

This provides for the legal licensing of breweries, wineries, and distilleries, for which there is set for the distillery an annual license fee of $3,500; for the rectifying plants, $3,500; and for wineries, $500.

Those three manufacturers come under the heading of "manufacturer's license class A." There are two classifications of manufacturers. I have just named the three of class A.

Class B manufacturer's license applies only to the brewery, for which there is an annual license fee of $2,500.

Then we have, in addition thereto, the wholesaler's license, class A, the annual fee of which is $1,500. That applies to the wholesalers who shall have on hand in their respective warehouses beer, wine, or liquors of various and sundry descriptions for sale only to the licensees, the retailers, namely, hotels, restaurants, clubs, and taverns.

Class A wholesalers may sell all classes of beverages to license holders for resale, and also may sell beer and light wines to consumers.

For the wholesaler's license, class B, there is an annual fee of $750.

The wholesale licensees of class C may sell beer and light wines only to licensees for resale to consumers.

In addition to that we have under this bill made provision for retailers of various classifications.

Under class A retailer's license, annual fee $750, they may sell whisky, wine, and beer and make delivery thereof; that is to say, in off-sale packages.

Class B retailer's license, with an annual fee of $100, permits the sale of wine and beer only.

Under class C retailer's license, restaurants, hotels, and clubs are permitted to make sale of whisky, wine, and beer—on sale only—when seated at tables, except at clubs or hotels, where it can be served in the rooms. The annual fee set for the restaurant is $500. For the hotel under 100 rooms the annual fee is $500. For the hotel with 100 rooms or more the annual fee is $1,000. For the club it is $250. For the marine vessel the fee is $50 a month or $500 a year. For the railroad dining car or club car the fee is $2 a month or $20 a year.

Retailers' license, class D, applies to taverns selling beer and serving sandwiches and salads, but no requirement is made as to buying food with the beer. The annual fee of the tavern is $200. Marine vessels will be required to pay a fee of $20 a month or $200 a year. Railroad dining cars or club cars are taxed $1 per month or $10 a year.

Retailer's license, class E, with an annual fee of $25, applies to druggists selling straight whisky on doctor's prescription only.

Retailer's license, class F, covers picnics, banquets, and assemblages of various kinds, the fee being $5 per day.

Some inquiry has been directed to the committee as to the distribution of these stimulants—beer, wine, and whisky. Of course, we all know that the distilleries, the wineries, and the breweries will have representatives call from time to time upon the licensees; that is to say, the hotels, the clubs, the vessels, the restaurants, and the taverns. We make provision for the licensing of men who represent the distilleries and who will call from time to time upon the licensees, and we set that license fee at $100 per individual; and, in addition to that, the members of the liquor control board shall have within their power the right—not only shall it be their privilege, but it shall be a part of their duty—to ascertain the character of the individual, whom he represents, what he is selling, and so forth.

We have endeavored, in the draft of this bill, to cover every single man who would dispense strong drink; who would make sale of even light wines and beers. We require the applicant, the licensee, to be a man of good moral character and one who has not within the past 10 years violated any law where the violation would be classified as a felony. But, in order that the people of this District might be protected, we have gone further. We have included the requirement, as set out in this measure, that every man who receives a license to make dispensation of intoxicating beverages not only shall be a man of good character, not only a man of good standing in his community, but that he shall not have been convicted of a violation of the prohibition law within the past 10 years.

Why did we do that? Because of those who have violated that national law. No man who has ever violated the prohibition law and been convicted thereof, and applies for a license, will be licensed, because it will be the intent and the interest of the members of the liquor board, it will be the intent and the interest of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that these places where wines, where beer, where liquors are sold be owned and be conducted by men of good moral character.

We go further than that. We require that every individual securing a license give to the board of control a bond by some recognized surety company in the sum of $1,000. We require a bond by a surety company rather than by an individual for these reasons: An individual today may be worth $100,000 and a year or 2 years or 5 years from now he may not be worth anything. As a consequence thereof, there would be no opportunity on the part of the board of control or the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make collection on a forfeiture of the bond or any part thereof.

There is another reason why we require a surety company rather than an individual. If an individual is on the bond of a licensee and that licensee does something to bring about a forfeiture of the bond, we find that individual bondsman going into court pleading, perhaps, with the presiding judge or pleading perhaps with those who are prosecuting the case, pleading with those who have the power not to exact the penalty. By requiring the individual licensees to give a surety bond all of that will be eliminated.

The distribution of liquor and other beverages in the District of Columbia will be under the direction of a board of control. The city Commissioners will have and are authorized to name three citizens to constitute what is to be known as the "Liquor Control Board of the District of Columbia."

It is required that each and every member of that board of three shall have been a bona fide resident of the District of Columbia for a period in duration of not less than 3 years. The Commissioners of the District are empowered to name those men, all of whom, of course, will be selected with due regard to their character, their experience, their capabilities, and their reliability. The salary fixed for each of these individuals is $5,000 a year, and they are to be named for 2, 4, and 6 years, respectively.

It has been suggested by someone that we have not made provision herein for the prevention of the return of the saloon. I say to Senators in all frankness and in perfect candor that every single possible feature that can be embodied to prevent the return of the saloon has been embodied in this bill, and no stronger words, no stronger language could be employed to express, not only the interest of the members of this committee, not only the interest of the members of the committee of the House of Representatives, not only the interest of the Members of the House of Representatives themselves but the interest of the American people, because the Democratic Party in its platform said, "We shall oppose the return of the open saloon", and we stand here today opposing as vigorously as we can the return of the open saloon. If there is any single feature embodied in this bill under discussion that besmacks of anything relating to or parallel in any sense with the open saloon, we should like to have it uncovered.

In the olden days, as Senators well know, anybody who had the money could set up a grog shop, could set up a saloon, could secure credit from the distillers or the breweries for the purchase of equipment for his place. In addition thereto, he could purchase on credit the stimulants he intended to sell. Any man, regardless of character, could make sale of liquor if he had the price to pay for the license, and if, by hook or by crook, he could obtain the equipment and the credit in order to obtain the stimulants which he proposed to sell over the bar.

Nobody wants the return of the saloon. We shall ever stand against the return of the saloon, and in this bill I believe Senators will find that every single safeguard for the people of the District of Columbia has been set up, every single precaution against the return of the saloon and for the protection of the people of the District.

Even a man who works in a restaurant, who is employed in a hotel, could not serve, could not make sale of stimulants described under this measure, unless he were a man of good moral character; and if any violation of the license by the licensee is shown, the control board would have a right to have a hearing and to make disposition of the case; and if the licensee were not satisfied therewith, he would have the privilege of entering an appeal to the Board of Commissioners of the District.

Saloons? We all know that liquor has been with us since the creation of dawn. We all know that liquor is with us now. We all know that liquor will be with us so long as this world lasts; and therefore it resolves itself into but one question, and that question is this, How shall it best be controlled?

At last the American people have awakened to the fact that the greatest enemy of this Government was a man by the name of John Barleycorn. Old John ran all over this country, destroying youth, selling mean liquor, importing it from foreign lands, and for 13 long years he never paid one cent in taxes toward the maintenance of this Government.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. Will not the Senator give us his definition of a saloon?

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is difficult, because there are so many definitions. I will illustrate by this statement. There is such a thing as a private saloon; there is such a thing as a public saloon. In the olden days there was such a thing as a saloon where people were permitted to drink liquor while they were lying down as well as while they were standing up. It does not make any difference whether a man is standing up, whether he is sitting down, or whether he is lying down; if the place is one in which a man drinks standing up, sitting down, or lying down, is a grog shop, where a customer is permitted to drink and drink and drink, and then sell him more drink after he is drunk, and the place is visited by the populace, I would say that, in the language of the olden days, was a saloon.

I want to say this in passing, that I am glad the Senator from Minnesota brought the question of the saloon to my attention, because I want to show what a great change has taken place in this country since the days of the old saloon. There is not a man in the Senate but who remembers that when, in his youthful days, he would return to his home town from college, there was a saloon on almost every corner and a decent, respectable young man in those days would hardly think of looking through the doors of a saloon, much less go into one, because in those days, when we were taught temperance and when we practiced sobriety, any young man seen going into a saloon was absolutely swept from the shelter of polite and decent society.

I can remember the days, when from the university in my beloved mountainous section of western North Carolina, I would attend the dances at the old Battery Park Hotel, a resort hotel, and in those days any young man who went to a dance with the smell of liquor upon his breath could not get a dance with any decent, respectable girl. Everyone knows that. If the mother of that decent, respectable girl smelled liquor on the young man's breath, he was not welcome beyond the threshold or by the fireside.

Those were the days of the saloon. They were the days when the young man who had liquor upon his breath was not welcome to the home of any respectable citizen; was not welcomed by the mother or father of any girl in that community. Nowadays, however, it seems to be the smart thing to have liquor upon one's breath. It seems to be the smart thing to indulge in liquor.

What we are trying to do is to get away from the old saloon. We are trying to get away from the idea that if one drinks it is smart. We are trying to get back to where it is anything but smart to drink liquor. We are seeking temperance and sobriety.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I have just read the proposed bill, wherein reference is made to clubs, hotels, and other places where intoxicating liquors may be served. In advocating the passage of this bill is not the Senator from North Carolina therefore advocating bigger and better saloons instead of the old-fashioned one?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Not at all. I am glad the Senator from Kentucky mentioned that. We are not advocating any such thing. Not a single place within the District of Columbia will be permitted to have a bar. Not a single place within the District of Columbia, according to the licensing act, will be permitted to have what is known as a "traveling bar"; that is, where one sits down at a table and the representative of that licensee makes the rounds with a miniature bar on wheels. That is not permitted under the terms of this bill. We are not advocating bigger and better saloons. There is a radical distinction. In the old days there was the bar, the sawdust, the cuspidors, selling liquor in any sort of tavern. By the terms of this bill liquor must be sold in a reputable place, and the place must be licensed for the sale of intoxicating beverages by the board of control. The character and standing of every single man who has anything to do with such an establishment must be inquired into and passed upon by the members of the board of control.

Some people have advocated unlimited dispensaries of liquor for the District of Columbia. I will say to the chairman of the committee, Senator KING, that I desire to make mention of that at this time, because it is somewhat in line with the question of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. You can go to a dispensary when you are going home from work; you are tired, and you feel the need of a little stimulant; you buy a pint, you buy a quart; you go to your home; you sit down; you open up the bottle, and you say, "Well, I will just take one little drink"; and that one little drink gets down there and it is lonesome. Then you say, "Well, I will take another little drink"; and that other little drink gets down there, and they get to fighting. Then you say, "Well, I will have to send one in to separate them." You send that third drink in to separate them, and then there is a rough house, and before you know it that whole bottle is gone. Whereas, under the terms of this bill one is permitted to make purchase of one drink and go along on his way, or, if he so desires, he may go to the nearest grocery store and make his purchase.

Whenever it is endeavored to conceal strong drink, whenever it is endeavored to make it hard to get, then we are encouraging people to violate the law.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is, of course, aware of the fact that both national platforms of the two great parties, the Democratic platform and the Republican platform, declared in favor of the outlawry of the saloon.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina whether he knows any better definition of a saloon, no matter what one may call it, than a place which permits the sale and consumption on the premises of liquor by the drinker.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I do not know any better definition, but I can tell the Senator the difference.

Mr. CLARK. I would be glad to have the Senator explain that.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am going to do so.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. SCHALL. I have listened, Mr. President, with a great deal of interest to the description of the tired business man who took home a bottle. I was thinking of what he did when the bottle was empty, and comparing that man with the same gentleman who would put three or four drinks inside him to keep them from scrapping so hard if he were in a saloon where a barrel would be the limit.

Mr. REYNOLDS. When the bottle is empty all he does is go to bed.

Mr. SCHALL. If he is in a saloon, where the barrel is the limit, what does he do then?

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator from Minnesota, with the permission of the Senator from North Carolina, that under the terms of the pending bill it would be a violation of the law, for which the license would be forfeited, to sell to any person——

Mr. SCHALL. More than three drinks?

Mr. KING. I will ask the Senator to wait until I complete my sentence—to sell to any person in a hotel or restaurant or other place where, under the terms of the bill, liquors may be dispensed, who is intoxicated, or who appears to be intoxicated, or to any person of notoriously intemperate habits.

While I did not support the bill in the committee, preferring a measure that would take the profit out of the liquor traffic, I attempted to aid the committee in drafting a bill that would eliminate evils in the liquor traffic and be promotive of temperance. I was particularly desirous of restricting the use of so-called "hard liquors" and supported a dispensary system, something similar to that obtaining in the Canadian Province of Quebec. In my opinion, a proper interpretation of this bill will lead to the conclusion that it does not permit conditions which obtained under the old saloon, which, as the Senator from Missouri just stated, has been denounced by both political parties.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for just a moment to permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I would like to ask the Senator from Utah if it is not a fact that in the days before the enactment of the eighteenth amendment the excise laws of practically every State of the Union contained just exactly such provision as he is talking about in this proposed law, which at the same time permitted the evils of the old saloon and brought about the enactment of the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator's question, I can answer "No." That evils existed when the old saloon system prevailed, I admit. Undoubtedly the old saloons were largely responsible for the demand for the eighteenth amendment. In some States which licensed saloons there were inadequate regulations for their control, and such regulations were too often not enforced. In other States the laws and regulations governing the sale of liquors were enforced in a reasonably satisfactory manner.

I recall that in several cities that I visited the number of licenses granted were limited and strict regulations were promulgated and enforced, and drunkenness was not frequent.

But there were more than 25 States that had prohibitory statutes at the time the eighteenth amendment was adopted, and in many of them the illicit traffic in liquor was serious and demoralizing.

The cause of prohibition was gaining ground, and many persons who believed in prohibition were not favorable to the policy which placed the liquor traffic under the control of the Federal Government. They preferred to win the goal of Nation-wide prohibition through the States and by means of State control. It was my opinion that the cause of temperance would not be advanced by an amendment to the Constitution and by Federal laws. I believed that Federal control would fail to properly deal with the problem; that the States having prohibitory statutes would not enforce them and would leave to the National Government the responsibility of handling every phase of the question.

Opposition to the eighteenth amendment was inevitable; the causes of this opposition were numerous. But it is certain that if the States do not deal with the liquor question in a sane and rational manner, if the evils of the old saloon system are permitted to return, if drunkenness and its attendant vices are permitted to develop and flourish, then an aroused public will again demand that the Federal Government assert authority over the liquor question.

I admit the implication of the able Senator from Missouri that in many places the evils to which he referred existed. In many places brewers owned or leased the buildings in which the saloons were set up and supplied all the fixtures and furniture found therein. They procured the licenses and placed persons of their choice in charge with instructions in many instances to sell only liquors that were manufactured or blended by them.

Under the terms of this proposed bill those things are prevented. The "tied saloon", tied to the manufacturer, tied to the distiller, tied to the brewer, is forbidden in terms that may not be ignored or misunderstood in the pending measure.

Some of us believe that the dispensary system, to which I have referred, possesses some advantages over the pending bill, but a majority of the committee, after considering the question fully, resolved against this plan, and the bill before us is the one which a majority of the committee reported.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator from North Carolina indulge me for just a moment further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah whether he believes there is any effective method of getting away from the evils of the old saloon system, against which both national parties in the last national campaign inveighed, except by the removal of private profit from the retail sale of liquor?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, one may not with certainty indulge in prophecy or predict what may or may not happen in a polyglot population such as that existing in the United States. We have residing here people from all countries, from the wine-using and beer-drinking countries of Europe. They have their traditions, customs, habits, and desires. There are those who are addicted to the use of hard liquor. I do not know, Mr. President, whether any plan that may be devised by the wit of man may prohibit the consumption of every kind of alcoholic beverages.

The Anti-Saloon League spent many millions of dollars in extensive propaganda during a limited period of years—which fact was elicited by a committee of which I was a member—in its endeavor to fasten prohibition upon the country. Many good men and women, recognizing the evils of intemperance, consecrated their lives to the prohibition cause. During the World War the activities of these and other organizations became so potent as that they were able to force the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. That was followed by the enactment of the Volstead Act, and there were pæans of joy in all parts of the United States among the organizations to which I have referred, and on the part of many others who were not members of those organizations but who were believers in temperance, because they believed that the day had come when the use of intoxicating liquor was forever banished from this Republic. I did not believe that to be so; I was opposed to the eighteenth amendment, and voted against the Volstead Act, though I was traditionally a "dry", and in my State I had aided in securing prohibitory enactments. But all the efforts made under the eighteenth amendment and State and municipal laws in support of that amendment or State and municipal laws otherwise in order to carry out the views of the people within the State under their local laws proved ineffective, and, as was stated by the Senator from North Carolina, there was a rising tide of opposition to the eighteenth amendment.

There was a general feeling throughout the United States, even in the so-called "dry State of Maine", as well as in other "dry" States, that the day had come for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and, so far as possible, for the adoption of some plan under which, in a reasonable and proper way, with all reasonable restrictions and limitations, alcoholic beverages might be obtained.

I understand from the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri that he still believes in the eighteenth amendment and in the efficacy of prohibitory laws. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the way to deal with this question is to recognize, as realists, as we must, the conditions existing and deal with them in a rational manner and in a way that will promote temperance.

The Senator from Missouri knows that in France, in Italy, and in the other wine-drinking countries of Europe—and I am not to be understood by the statement which I am now making as being an advocate of the drinking of wine or liquor at all—there is but little intemperance, as the term is applied here. One seldom sees a drunken man in France. In my visits to that country I have seen but one drunken man, and he was an American; and I think the same statement applies to Italy. I have been in Germany a number of times, but I never saw a national of that country intoxicated while there. One of the weaknesses of the American people is that they have a predilection for hard liquor. If our people had—and I think my friends the Senators from California will approve of this statement—a greater desire for the light wines of California, perhaps we would never have had the open saloons; we would not have had the intemperance which was an evil that we protested against and sought to eradicate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator this question: Is not the way to handle the problem which the Senator has just been so ably presenting, the adoption of a provision calling for a differentiation in the matter of dispensing hard liquors and light wines, such as the provision contained, as I understand, in the substitute proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], but which is not contained in the bill reported by the committee?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have a great deal of sympathy, I may say to my friend from Missouri, with the proposition embodied in the measure which will be offered as a substitute by the Senator from Kansas. I have stated upon a number of occasions that I was disposed to favor the dispensary system as that system has been developed and maintained in Quebec rather than what might be denominated the licensing system. I may add, however, that investigations which have been made into the operations of the dispensary system, investigations conducted by organizations in the United States as well as by persons in Canada, have revealed the fact that that law, designed to curb intemperance or to promote temperance, is violated.

We cannot disguise the fact that the liquor question is a problem in the United States. It is not so much a problem in France or Italy or Germany; but here different conditions exist, and with the taste for hard liquors it is a difficult thing to deal with this great question. If those who have favored the repeal of the eighteenth amendment—and I was among the number—lay the flattering unction to their souls that by its repeal the liquor question is solved, and solved forever, they will find themselves mistaken. The only thing to do, in all conscience and as wise men, if we have wisdom, is to try to deal with this problem in a wise and in a proper way, recognizing human limitations, human virtues, human weaknesses, human appetites, and human traditions, and, taking into account all those forces, elements, and factors, try to enact laws which will promote genuine and true temperance.

I apologize to my friend from North Carolina for intruding upon his time.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like to say to the junior Senator from Missouri——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina or of the chairman of the committee what provisions there are in this bill relating to the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sunday?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I will say, in answer to the question, Mr. President, that the bill provides that the Commissioners shall have the authority to permit the sale of intoxicating beverages on Sunday.

Mr. WALSH. I think the committee have reported a very excellent bill. It seems to me that they have handled this problem in a very satisfactory manner. I do feel, however, that the matter of whether or not intoxicating liquors shall be sold in the District on Sunday should not be left to the control of the Commissioners, who, I think, are certain to be subjected to a great deal of pressure and influence. It seems to me—and I feel very strongly about it as one who strongly favored the repeal of the eighteenth amendment but who earnestly favors the promotion of temperance—that this bill should positively prohibit the sale of spiritous liquors on Sunday.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me further, I think if he would make an exception under doctors' prescriptions, it would be well to provide that liquor might be sold in that way.

Mr. WALSH. I propose to offer an amendment preventing the sale of intoxicating liquor on Sunday, the sale of liquors known as spiritous liquors, except in the case of sale by druggists on a physician's prescription. My amendment will not, if the Commissioners choose, prevent the sale of beer and wines on Sunday under proper regulation.

Mr. KING. I can assure the Senator there will be no objection and the committee will accept such an amendment.

Mr. WALSH. The reasons are obvious. We cannot buy clothing and we cannot buy groceries on Sunday. Many other classes of business are prohibited from being conducted on Sunday. It seems to me we ought to limit the sale of liquors on Sunday in public places to light wines and beer in the interest of temperance.

Mr. KING. There are some objections to it by some part of the population. We have, for instance, the Seventh-day Adventists. They comprise a large number of very fine people, none better, whose Sunday is on Saturday. The Senate will remember when we had up the barber bill which required the closing of barber shops on Sunday there was very great protest, and we had to modify it to provide that there should be one day in the seven days when the barber shops should be closed. We are confronted again with that situation, but, speaking for the committee, we will accept the Senator's amendment and let it go to conference.

Mr. WALSH. As one particularly interested in the new deal in intoxicating liquors being a success I am apprehensive, from the observations already made in certain parts of the country, that there will be a very vigorous attack made upon the system we are inaugurating and in favor of a return to prohibition if we permit the unrestrained sale of strong liquors on Sunday. We are going to have a very strong protest from the clergy of all denominations and from all religious-minded people if we are going to permit an exhibition of intoxicated persons reeling out of places where intoxicating liquor is sold on Sunday. I am glad to know the committee is in accord with my views on this particular matter. I shall offer the suggested amendment when the parliamentary situation permits it.

Two other amendments that I presented to the Senate a few days ago have been incorporated in the committee amendments to the House bill, and therefore it becomes unnecessary to discuss or offer them.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, we are quite in accord with the Senator from Massachusetts.

I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] had in mind a moment ago a statement which appears in the minority report to the effect that "the principal argument for such a system is that it takes the profit out of the liquor business."

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield at that point——

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I did not have that in mind because as a matter of fact I had not read the minority report. If the minority report contains that sentence, it very accurately reflects my views on the subject.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thought the Senator had that in mind. I would that it were possible to eliminate private profits and property from the liquor business, but we have the distilleries owned by private corporations and therefore private property and private profits. We have all the wineries maintained by private interests and corporations and therefore private property and profits. Likewise we have the brewery. So it is impossible under the present state of affairs to eliminate the profit from the various fountains of these industries. The Senator will probably be interested in knowing that there is in the Province of Quebec a sort of dispensary system. I am reliably informed that in that Province there are not only several thousand bootleggers such as we have had in this country but, in addition thereto, as a result of that system, which limits the profits of the Government, there are some 5,000 speak-easies which have sprung up overnight. There is an element of private property there.

In pursuance of that particular thought——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, I am not advised where the Senator gets his statistics on the subject of the number of bootleggers or the number of speak-easies in Quebec. The Senator's figures are very much at variance with the information I have about the operation of the law in Quebec.

I should like to point out to the Senator that the Quebec system, where they have the dispensary, is more nearly analogous to the system proposed to be set up in the District of Columbia under the pending bill than that of any other jurisdiction in the world of which I have any knowledge.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I shall be very glad to endeavor to find some statistics in regard to that matter and submit them to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I apologize to the Senator for interrupting him.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am always glad to be interrupted by the Senator. I welcome these interruptions. We are all here for the same purpose, for the purpose of ascertaining what will be best for the people of the District of Columbia and best for the people of the country.

If we had the dispensary system in this country what would be the result? The result would be that right here in the District of Columbia there would spring up over night innumerable speak-easies where people could go and communicate and commune with their friends and buy their liquors by the drink. If we do not permit the sale of liquor in restaurants and in the larger hotels what would be the result? The result would be the same thing that we have seen in Washington at many public functions where food is served. If one is at all observant, one can go to the larger hotels on an evening when they have a dance or some public function and see people slipping bottles from the hip pockets and pouring out their liquor. We want to do away with that.

Then there is the matter which was mentioned a moment ago by the chairman of the committee [Mr. KING]. The Senator from Missouri has traveled extensively in continental Europe. If he traveled in France——

Mr. CLARK. That is the only place in continental Europe that I have traveled.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Or in England or Belgium or Holland or Germany or Poland or Austria or Spain or Portugal—if he traveled anywhere in the countries in northern Africa, if he traveled in the provinces of India or China or Japan, what did he find? He found that anybody can buy beer or wine or liquor any time he wants it, and in any quantity desired, and yet he probably never saw anybody drunk there.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator's argument as to continental Europe be correct and be applicable to the United States, then this bill is indefensible, because it is proposed to permit liquor to be sold in every grocery store and drug store and even in clothing stores.

Mr. REYNOLDS. We are proposing to permit its sale in grocery stores, in drug stores on prescription, and in restaurants and hotels. We want to make it so that people can get it but get it lawfully. We first want to collect the taxes. Secondly, we want to take it out from hypocrisy and deceit.

When we get to continental Europe, or anywhere in the world on the five continents of the globe, we find less drunkenness than we find here. We find more drunkenness here than any place else in the world. It seems to be true that where the people can get it they do not drink it. On the Champs Elysees in Paris, on the Linden in Berlin, where there are hundreds of cafes along the sidewalks, there will be seen men and women, boys and girls sitting there, but they are not drinking beer or wine or whisky. They are drinking chocolate and having tea with cakes. But in this country prohibition has made of the American people drinkers of hard liquor.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator that if in his travels over Europe he did not see any drunks his experience was very different from the experience I had. In France I saw numerous intoxicated men. My friend, Representative MILLIGAN, from my State, who served in my regiment during the war and is now sitting at my side, will bear me out in that statement. My experience has been very different from that detailed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] or the Senator from North Carolina himself.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That was during the war, was it not?

Mr. CLARK. Oh, yes; that was during the war.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That was different, because they were celebrating then. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. During the year I spent in France there was very little celebrating done there.

Mr. REYNOLDS. After the armistice they had a perfect right to celebrate. I have seen very few drunken men across the waters. I saw a drunk in Russia last summer. I think I saw one or two in Paris. But I am sure the Senator will agree that we will find more drunken people in the United States than in any other country in the world.

Mr. CLARK. That is precisely the reason why I think there should be a very definite distinction made in the system of liquor dispensation in this country between sale of beers and light wines and the sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. REYNOLDS. There is a very radical distinction set forth in the bill. Only the restaurants and the hotels and the clubs can make sale of whisky. I believe the Senator will agree that in a great many clubs they have their whisky, buying it by the case, and then serve it. They did that during prohibition and certainly they are going to do it now when we have no prohibition.

Mr. CLARK. I am not among the number of those who consider that the definition of a saloon is a place where one can put his foot on a brass rail.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I am glad to know the Senator is that broad-minded.

Mr. CLARK. It does not matter whether it is called a hotel, or a club, or a tavern, or by any other name; if the sale of liquor is permitted by the drink, for consumption on the premises, it falls within every reasonable definition of a saloon, which was declared against by both national platforms in the campaign of 1932.

I well recall, Mr. President, that when I was a youth we had as Governor of Missouri a great reformer by the name of Joseph W. Folk. He passed the first Sunday-closing law in Missouri; but under that act the sale of liquor was permitted in hotels and clubs. There sprang up all over the State of Missouri a vast number of so-called "clubs" which came to be known as "lid clubs"; and I can remember as a youth that when a man would come into St. Louis on Sunday morning, on one of the early trains getting into St. Louis ordinarily at 7 o'clock in the morning or 8:30 on a great number of railroads which terminate in St. Louis, the traveler would be asked by the porter, the "redcap" who carried his bag through the station, whether he desired to be inducted into a "lid club"; and the cost of joining one of those "lid clubs" was 25 cents. Those "lid clubs" were saloons as much as the saloons which had been outlawed on Sunday, although they did not carry the same title.

Mr. WALSH. My amendment would prevent that occurring in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK. It will prevent it on Sunday, but not on any other day in the week. I do not think Congress ought to legislate about Sunday at all.

Mr. REYNOLDS. We have in this act endeavored to legislate against that, and I think we have been successful, in that we require that a club shall have been in legitimate existence for a period of at least 3 months prior to the issuance of the license; so, as a result thereof, it would be impossible for a lot of clubs to spring up like mushrooms overnight.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I will agree that it will be impossible for them to spring up for a period of 3 months; but after the 3 months' period had expired it will be entirely possible.

Mr. REYNOLDS. And thereafter likewise, because it is exclusively within the control of the board to say whether or not this club or that club shall be licensed; and certainly they are going to make diligent inquiry as to whether or not it is a legitimate club and one of a character that should be licensed.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator is content to rest the matter entirely in the discretion of a board, instead of providing by law on this subject, which I still insist is in derogation of both national platforms, that typifies a view which I do not wish further to argue.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In answer to that, and for the Senator's information, I wish to read section (g), defining the word "club":

> The word "club" means a corporation for the promotion of some common object (not including corporations organized for any commercial or business purpose, the object of which is money profit), owning, hiring, or leasing a building or space in a building of such extent and character as in the judgment of the board may be suitable and adequate for the reasonable and comfortable use and accommodations of its members and their guests, and including such space outside of the building and adjoining it as may be approved by the board, and provided with such suitable and adequate kitchen and dining room space and equipment, implements, and facilities, and employing such a sufficient number of employees for cooking, preparing, and serving meals for its members and their guests, as shall satisfy the board that the sale of beverages intended is not more than an incident to and is not the prime source of revenue from such space; and the affairs and management of such corporation are conducted by a board of directors, executive committee, or similar body chosen by the members at least once each calendar year and no officer, agent, or employee of the club is paid directly or indirectly, or receives in the form of salary or other compensation, any profit from the disposition or sale of beverages to the club or to the members of the club or guests introduced by members, beyond the amount of such salary as may be fixed and voted by the members or by its directors or other governing body.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator certainly does not contend that the language which he has just read involves any prohibition against the very type of "lid clubs" that I have just been talking about, except in the discretion of the board, to be composed we know not of whom. I insist that this is such an important matter, and such explicit pledges were made to the American people leading up to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, that the matter should be regulated by law, and not left to the discretion of some unknown appointee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK. What was the request, Mr. President?

Mr. KING. The usual one as to dispensing with the formal reading of the bill, and proceeding to read it for action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection. The clerk will read the bill.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "the", to strike out "act of Congress entitled 'An act to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries', approved October 28, 1919, and all acts supplemental to and amendatory thereof" and insert "National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented"; on page 2, line 1, after the word "as", to strike out "they affect" and insert "it affects"; in line 5, before the word "hereby", to strike out "are" and insert "is"; in the same line, after the word "of", to insert "title III, and"; in line 6, after the figure "4", to strike out the comma; in the same line, after the word "act", to strike out "of Congress, approved October 28, 1919"; and in line 7, after the word "alcohol", to strike out "and title III of said act", so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, insofar as it affects the manufacture, sale, and possession in the District of Columbia and the transportation in, into, and from the District of Columbia of alcoholic beverages upon which the Federal tax has been paid, is hereby repealed, with the exception of title III, and section 4 of title II of said act, insofar as it affects denatured alcohol.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 9, after the word "the", to insert "District of Columbia", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. This act may be cited as the "District of Columbia Alcoholic Beverage Control Act." It shall apply only to the District of Columbia and shall not authorize the delivery of alcoholic beverages outside of the District of Columbia in violation of the law of the place of delivery.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 23, after the word "means", to strike out "wine as defined in title 26, sections 441 and 444, of the Code of the Laws of the United States of America, as now in force or hereafter amended, and champagne, sparkling wine and artificially carbonated wine, means all the foregoing as defined by regulations of the Treasury Department as now or hereafter in effect" and to insert "any alcoholic beverage obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar, including all artificial or imitation wines and also including fortified wines such as port and sherry" and on page 3, line 10, after the word "carbonated" and the period, to insert "No wine not manufactured from the juice of fresh, sound, ripe grapes shall be sold unless the container in which it is sold shall bear a legible label firmly affixed thereto stating the product or products from which the same was manufactured", so as to read:

(c) The word "wine" means any alcoholic beverage obtained by the fermentation of the natural sugar contents of fruits or other agricultural products containing sugar, including all artificial or imitation wines and also including fortified wines such as port and sherry. Light wines shall mean wines containing 14 percent or less of alcohol by volume, other than champagne or any wine artificially carbonated. No wine not manufactured from the juice of fresh, sound, ripe grapes shall be sold unless the container in which it is sold shall bear a legible label firmly affixed thereto stating the product or products from which the same was manufactured.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 20, after the word "which", to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty", so as to read:

(j) The word "hotel" means a suitable building or other structure, approved by the board, including such suitable space outside of the building and adjoining it as may be approved by the board, kept, used, maintained, advertised, or held out to the public to be a place where meals are served and sleeping accommodations offered for pay to transient guests; in which 50 or more rooms are used for the sleeping accommodations of such transient guests, and having one or more dining rooms where meals are served to such transient guests, such sleeping accommodations and dining rooms being conducted in the same building or in connecting buildings, and such building or buildings, structure or structures being provided with such adequate kitchen and dining room equipment and capacity and having employed therein such number and kinds of employees for preparing, cooking, and serving meals for its guests as shall satisfy the board that such dining room is intended for use primarily as a place for preparing, cooking, and serving meals and that the chief source of revenue to be derived from the operation of such dining room shall be from the preparation, cooking, and serving of meals and not from the sale of beverages. No such space shall be considered suitable if any business is conducted therein other than the preparation, cooking, and serving of meals, except such a business as is incidental to a bona fide dining room.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 17, after the word "the", to strike out "day and the serving of" and insert "day; and", so as to read:

(l) The word "meals" means the usual assortment of foods commonly ordered at various hours of the day; and such food and victuals as sandwiches and salads shall not be regarded as a "meal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 10, after the word "persons" and the comma, to strike out "at least one of whom shall be a woman", and insert "subject to removal by the Commissioners"; on page 9, line 2, before the words "per annum", to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$5,000"; and in line 5, after the word "corporation", to strike out "counsels" and insert "counsel", so as to read:

SEC. 4. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, within 15 days after the approval of this act, shall appoint a board of three persons, subject to removal by the Commissioners, to be called the alcoholic beverage control board, each of the members of which shall be a citizen of the United States and a resident of the District of Columbia for at least 3 years immediately preceding his appointment and have during that period claimed residence nowhere else. Of the three persons first appointed as members of said board, one shall be appointed for 2 years, one for 3 years, and one for 4 years, and thereafter all appointments shall be for the term of 4 years, except such appointments as may be made for the remainder of unexpired terms. Vacancies caused by death, resignation, or otherwise shall be filled by the Commissioners only for the unexpired terms. Members shall be eligible for reappointment. The Commissioners shall designate one of the members of the board to be chairman thereof. The salary of each of the members of the board shall be $5,000 per annum. The Commissioners are authorized to employ such other personal services, including three additional assistant corporation counsel, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act, and to provide for the expenses of the board. The salaries of employees, other than members of the board, shall be fixed in accordance with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The Commissioners shall include in their annual estimates such amounts as may be required for the salaries and expenses herein authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I desire to give notice that after we conclude the amendments, I shall move to strike out the words "three additional assistant corporation counsels."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 12, to strike out:

Said members of the Board may be removed by the Commissioners only for cause and after service of written charges and opportunity to be heard thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 14, after the word "interest" and the semicolon, to insert "to limit the number of licenses of each class to be issued in the District of Columbia and to limit the number of licenses of each class in any locality in, or sections or portions of, the District of Columbia as they may deem proper in the public interest"; on the same page, line 23, after the word "to", to strike out "April 5, 1933" and insert "the date of enactment of this act", and at the end of the same line, before the word "near", to strike out "conducted", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. The Commissioners are hereby authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations not inconsistent with this act as they may deem necessary to carry out the purposes thereof and to control and regulate the manufacture, sale, keeping for sale, offer for sale, solicitation of orders for sale, importation, exportation, and transportation of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia for the protection of the public health, comfort, safety, and morals.

The Commissioners shall have specific authority to make rules and regulations for the issuance, transfer, and revocation of licenses; to facilitate and insure the collection of taxes; to govern the operation of the business of licensees, with full power and authority to prescribe the terms and conditions under which alcoholic beverages may be sold by each class of licensees; to forbid the issuance of licenses for manufacture, sale, or storage of alcoholic beverages in such localities in, and such sections and portions of, the District of Columbia as they may deem proper in the public interest; to limit the number of licenses of each class to be issued in the District of Columbia and to limit the number of licenses of each class in any locality in, or sections or portions of, the District of Columbia as they may deem proper in the public interest; to forbid the issuance of licenses for businesses conducted on such premises as they, in the public interest, may deem inappropriate; to forbid the issuance of any class or classes of licenses for businesses established subsequent to the date of enactment of this act near or around schools, colleges, universities, churches, or public institutions, to prescribe the hours during which beverages may be sold and to forbid the sale on Sundays. The powers and authorities expressly enumerated are to be construed as in addition to, and not by way of limitation of, the general powers herein granted. Different regulations may be prescribed for the different classes of licenses, for the different classes of beverages, and for different localities in or sections or portions of the District of Columbia.

Any regulations promulgated hereunder shall become effective 5 days after being published in any daily newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia. Such regulations may be altered or amended from time to time as the Commissioners may deem desirable. The Commissioners shall also have authority in any time of public emergency, without previous notice or advertisement, to prohibit the sale of any or all beverages during the period of such emergency.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, is that the amendment I offered, limiting the number of licenses to the discretion of the Commissioners?

Mr. KING. Yes, Mr. President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 20, before the word "beverage", to strike out "intoxicating", and on page 13, line 6, before the word "beverage", to strike out "intoxicating", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. No provision of this act shall apply to alcohol intended for use in the manufacture and sale of any of the following when they are unfit for beverage purposes, namely:

(a) Denatured alcohol produced and used pursuant to acts of Congress and regulations promulgated thereunder;

(b) Patent, proprietary, medicinal, pharmaceutical, antiseptic, and toilet preparations;

(c) Flavoring extracts, sirups, and food products;

(d) Scientific, chemical, mechanical, and industrial products.

Any person who shall knowingly sell any of the products enumerated in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), or (d), for beverage purposes, or who shall sell any of the same under circumstances from which he might reasonably deduce the intention of the purchaser to use them for such purposes, shall be subject to the penalties provided for in section 33 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 16, to strike out:

(b) No individual shall, within the District of Columbia, offer for sale or solicit any order for the sale of, within the District of Columbia, any alcoholic beverage unless:

(1) Such individual has first obtained a license of the character described in section 11, subsection (k); and

(2) The vendor is the holder of a manufacturer's license, class A or class B, or a wholesaler's license, class A or class B, issued under this act authorizing such sale.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

(b) No individual shall, within the District of Columbia, offer for sale or solicit any order for the sale of any alcoholic beverage, irrespective of whether such sale is to be made within or without the District of Columbia, unless such individual has first obtained a license of the character described in section 11, subsection (k).

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. (a) No individual, partnership, association, or corporation shall, within the District of Columbia, manufacture for sale, keep for sale, or sell any alcoholic beverage without having first obtained a license under this act for such manufacture or sale, except as provided in sections 31 and 32 hereof.

(b) No individual shall, within the District of Columbia, offer for sale or solicit any order for the sale of any alcoholic beverage, irrespective of whether such sale is to be made within or without the District of Columbia, unless such individual has first obtained a license of the character described in section 11, subsection (k).

Nothing in this subsection shall apply to any offer for sale or solicitation made upon the premises designated in the license of the vendor.

No individual shall, within the District of Columbia, offer any beverage for sale to, or solicit orders for the sale of any beverage from, any person not a licensee under this act, irrespective of whether such sale is to be made within or without the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 5, after the word "combining", to strike out "alcohol" and insert "alcohol" and a comma, so as to read:

(a) Manufacturer's license, class A: To operate a rectifying plant, a distillery, or a winery. Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to operate a rectifying plant for the manufacture of the products of rectification by purifying or combining alcohol, spirits, wine, or beer; a distillery for the manufacture of alcohol or spirits by distillation or redistillation; or a winery for the manufacture of wine; at the place therein described, but such license shall not authorize more than one of said activities, namely, that of a rectifying plant, a distillery, or a winery, and a separate license shall be required for each such plant. Such a license shall also authorize the sale from the licensed place of the products manufactured under such license by the licensee to another license holder for resale or to a dealer outside of the District of Columbia for resale. It shall not authorize the sale of beverages to any other person except as may be provided by regulations promulgated by the Commissioners under this act. The annual fee for such license for a rectifying plant shall be $3,500; for a distillery shall be $3,500; and for a winery shall be $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 20, before the words "per month", to strike out "$5" and insert "$2", and in line 21, before the words "per annum", to strike out "$50" and insert "$20", so as to read:

(g) Retailer's license, class C: Such a license shall be issued only for a bona fide restaurant, hotel, or club, or a passenger-carrying marine vessel serving meals, or a club car or a dining car on a railroad. It shall authorize the holder thereof to keep for sale and to sell spirits, wine, and beer at the place therein described for consumption only in said place. Except in the case of clubs and hotels, no beverage shall be sold or served to a customer in any closed container. In the case of restaurants and passenger-carrying marine vessels and club cars or dining cars on a railroad, said spirits and wine, except light wines, shall be sold or served only to persons seated at public tables, and beer and light wines shall be sold and served only to persons seated at public tables or at bona fide lunch counters, except that spirits, wine, and beer may be sold or served to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room when such room has been previously approved by the board. In the case of hotels, said beverages may be sold and served only in the private room of a registered guest or to persons seated at public tables or to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room, when such room has been previously approved by the Board. Beer and light wines may also be sold and served to persons seated at bona fide lunch counters. And in the case of clubs, said beverages may be sold and served in the private room of a member or guest of a member, or to persons seated at tables. No license shall be issued to a club which has not been established for at least 3 months immediately prior to the making of the application for such license.

The fee for such a license shall be for a restaurant, $500 per annum; for a hotel, under 100 rooms, $500 per annum; for a hotel of 100 or more rooms, $1,000 per annum; for a club, $250 per annum; for a marine vessel serving meals, $50 per month or $500 per annum; and for each railroad dining car or club car, $2 per month or $20 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 20, line 22, after the figures "$200", to insert a semicolon and "except that in the case of a marine vessel the fee shall be $20 per month or $200 per annum, and in the case of each railroad dining car or club car, $1 per month or $10 per annum", so as to read:

(h) Retailer's license, class D: Such a license shall be issued only for a bona fide restaurant, tavern, hotel, or club, or a passenger-carrying marine vessel serving meals, light lunches, or sandwiches, or a club car or a dining car on a railroad. Such a license shall authorize the holder thereof to sell beer at the place therein described for consumption only in said place. Except in the case of clubs and hotels, no beer shall be sold or served to a customer in any closed container. In the case of restaurants, taverns, and passenger-carrying marine vessels and club cars or dining cars on a railroad, said beer shall be sold or served only to persons seated at public tables or at bona fide lunch counters, except that beer may be sold or served to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room when such room has been previously approved by the Board. In the case of hotels, beer may be sold and served only in the private room of a registered guest or to persons seated at public tables or at bona fide lunch counters or to assemblages of more than six individuals in a private room when such room has been previously approved by the board. And in the case of clubs, beer may be sold and served in the private room of a member or guest of a member, or to persons seated at tables. No license shall be issued to a club which has not been established for at least 3 months immediately prior to the making of the application for such license.

The annual fee for such a license shall be $200; except that in the case of a marine vessel the fee shall be $20 per month or $200 per annum, and in the case of each railroad dining car or club car, $1 per month or $10 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

(e) If the judge or commissioner is thereupon satisfied of the existence of the grounds of the application or that there is probable cause to believe their existence, he must issue a search warrant signed by him with his name of office to the major and superintendent of police of the District of Columbia or any member of the Metropolitan Police Department, stating the particular grounds or probable cause for its issue and the names of the persons whose affidavits have been taken in support thereof, and commanding him forthwith to search the place named for the property specified and to bring it before the judge or commissioner.

(f) A search warrant may in all cases be served by any of the officers mentioned in its direction, but by no other person, except in aid of the officer on his requiring it, he being present and acting in its execution.

(g) The officer may break open any outer or inner door or window of a house, or any part of a house, or anything therein, to execute the warrant, if, after notice of his authority and purpose, he is refused admittance.

(h) The judge or commissioner must insert a direction in the warrant that it be served in the daytime unless the affidavit is positive that the property is in the place to be searched in which case he must insert a direction that it be served at any time in the day or night.

(i) A search warrant must be executed and returned to the judge or commissioner who issued it within 10 days after its date; after the expiration of this time the warrant, unless executed, is void.

(j) When the officer takes property under the warrant, he must give a copy of the warrant together with a receipt for the property taken (specifying it in detail) to the person from whom it was taken by him, or in whose possession it was found; or, in the absence of any person, he must leave it in the place where he found the property.

(k) The officer must forthwith return the warrant to the judge or commissioner and deliver to him a written inventory of the property taken, made publicly or in the presence of the person from whose possession it was taken, and of the applicant for the warrant, if they are present, verified by the affidavit of the officer at the foot of the inventory and taken before the judge or commissioner at the time, to the following effect: "I, R. S., the officer by whom this warrant was executed, do swear that the above inventory contains a true and detailed account of all of the property taken by me on the warrant."

(l) The judge or commissioner must thereupon, if required, deliver a copy of the inventory to the person from whose possession the property was taken and to the applicant for the warrant.

(m) The judge or commissioner must annex the affidavits, search warrant, return, inventory, and evidence, and at once file the same, together with a copy of the record of his proceedings, with the clerk of the police court.

(n) Whoever shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any such officer or person in serving or attempting to serve or execute any such search warrant, or shall assault, beat, or wound any such officer or person, knowing him to be an officer or person so authorized, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years.

(o) If the accused be discharged, the beverages and other property seized shall be returned to the person in whose possession they were found; if he be convicted, the said beverages and other property shall be forfeited, and may be destroyed by the police department or delivered for medicinal, mechanical, or scientific uses to any department or agency of the United States Government or the District of Columbia government or any hospital or other charitable institution in the District of Columbia, or sold at public auction, as the court may direct.

(p) If any of said property so seized, other than the said beverages and the containers thereof, shall be subject to a lien which is established by intervention or otherwise to the satisfaction of the court as being bona fide and as having been created without the lienor's having any notice that said property was to be used in connection with the illegal manufacture for sale, keeping for sale, or selling of alcoholic beverages, the court, upon the conviction of the accused, shall order a sale of said property at public auction and the officer making the sale, after deducting the expenses of keeping the property, the fee for the seizure and the cost of the sale, shall pay all such liens according to their priorities, and such lien or liens shall be transferred from the property to the proceeds of the sale thereof.

SEC. 36. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisions to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I make a brief statement explaining the purposes of the substitute which has just been offered.

I am opposed to the passage of the pending measure in its present form and cannot allow it to come to a vote without voicing that opposition and giving some of the reasons for my attitude.

It is not my intention to discuss national prohibition. The people of the United States have spoken upon that subject, through repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and I have accepted their verdict in good faith. The fact that I myself was opposed to repeal does not blind me to the fact that a constitutional majority has been registered on the other side, and this is a Government in which the majority is entitled to govern, so long as its will is registered in a constitutional and legal manner.

But, Mr. President, I do not believe that the measure now recommended by the Senate committee carries out the will of the majorities that supported repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The Association Opposed to the Eighteenth Amendment, and other avowed advocates of repeal, all urged that repeal was to be in the interest of sobriety and temperance. Repeal was not for the purpose of rebuilding the liquor traffic. It was not to countenance the return of the saloon or the evils attendant upon the saloon. It was to set up a better plan for eliminating the evils of the liquor traffic and reducing the consumption of liquor.

We have heard a lot about a dispensary system similar to the Quebec control system in Canada; we have heard that the Swedish system perhaps would be adapted to the United States. At any rate, the control and regulation of the sale of liquor was to be in the interest of temperance; it was to allow those who desired liquor to have it, but presumably in moderation.

The profit incentive was to be taken out of the liquor business. Liquor control was to be in the public interest, not in the interest of the manufacturers and sellers of liquor.

But, Mr. President, that is not the idea which we find in the measure now before us as it has come from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Instead of provision for dispensaries, where beverage liquor could be purchased and taken away, with the places themselves merely places of sale and not primarily places of consumption and carousal, as advocates of repeal told us would be the ideal system for handling the sale of liquor, what do we have here?

Mr. President, to put it bluntly, we have before us what I think is a return to the saloon system. The bill provides for the licensing of some 2,000 drinking places in the District of Columbia.

The measure does not in words provide for the return of the saloon. I will admit that. But it authorizes the licensing of something like 2,000 places in the District where liquor will be sold for profit, and the more sales, of course, the greater the profits.

That can only mean the 2,000 places of sale will be encouraged to build up their sales, and they will build up their sales in every way possible.

The liquor traffic, privately operated, whether the liquor is consumed standing up or sitting down, always is a vicious traffic under any guise, and the evils that accompany the saloon system will not be eliminated. The eighteenth amendment can be repealed, but the evils of the liquor traffic cannot be repealed.

The proposed substitute submitted by me for House bill 6181 provides for a liquor control board of three members, at a salary of $5,000 per annum each, the same as the District Commissioners' bill. It permits the sale of beer and light wine, by the drink, at restaurants, hotels, and clubs, as in the Commissioners' bill. The important difference is in the method of selling hard liquor. In the Commissioners' bill hard liquor is sold at hotels and restaurants by the drink, and in package form by druggists and other retail dealers. The purchaser is limited to 1 gallon at one time. The substitute bill provides that hard liquor should be sold in stores operated by the District board in package form not to be consumed on premises where sold and limits the amount that may be purchased to 1 gallon at a time. Under the committee bill license system, hard liquor will be sold at something like 1,000 places; under the dispensary plan set up by the substitute I am offering, the number of places where hard liquor may be sold will be restricted to something like 25–50 at the most.

Personally, I would have all liquor, including wine and beer, sold by a municipally controlled dispensary; but it was quite evident that the dispensary plan as set up in the proposed substitute was the best we could hope for.

The bill provides that the board shall determine the quality and standard of purity of all spirits by chemical tests before they may be sold anywhere in the District. The provisions as to sale of light wine and beer are practically the same in both bills, that is, such sale is limited to hotels and restaurants when sold by the drink, while package goods are sold in drug stores, grocery stores, or in other stores, but not to be consumed on premises where sold. Many of the licensing features for light wine and beer, both for off-sale and on-sale permits, carried by the District Commissioners' bill were written into the substitute bill. The original dispensary bill was drafted by Representative HOWARD SMITH, of Virginia, and some of the features of the proposed substitute were developed in the Senate District Committee hearing by Dr. F. W. Buck, of this city; as now presented to the Senate it was prepared by Corporation Counsels Bride and West in cooperation with the legislative counsel.

There is an appropriation of $250,000 as a revolving fund to put the act into operation.

It will be seen that the chief features of this dispensary plan are those which are designed to prevent the return of the saloon and to encourage the drinking of the milder form of liquors rather than hard liquors. The board is given ample power to regulate sales not only in the stores, but to regulate the licensees; and drunkenness under this plan should be reduced to a minimum.

I think it is admitted by all that the incentive for private profit has made the regulation of all liquor laws in the past almost impossible. If we shall go back to any licensing system permitting the sale of hard liquor by the drink, whether standing up or sitting down, we will have reopened the avenue for private profit in such a way as to bring back all the former evils. Under the dispensary system the board can purchase their liquor direct from the distillers and furnish it to the consumers so much cheaper than it could be sold under any licensing system permitting private profit that the bootlegger can be eliminated. Another important feature under the dispensary system is that the board can determine the quality of the liquor sold to the consumer and doubtless save a great many lives that would otherwise be shortened by the use of impure liquors. Let me add that the Senator from Massachusetts is right in his contention that the sale of liquor on Sunday should be absolutely prohibited. We have such a provision in the substitute dispensary bill.

I might add, Mr. President, that it is my belief that such profits as do come from the sale of liquor could better go to the Government, after the manufacturer has been allowed a reasonable profit for its manufacture.

The measure we enact ought to specifically prohibit the sale of liquor adjacent to school buildings. The committee bill does not do this. I do not believe this important matter should be left to the desires of those who propose to profit from sales of liquor to youths; neither should it be left to any board. No store where liquor is sold should be less than 400 feet from a school building.

I would like to see a provision in the bill prohibiting advertisements of liquors except in the places where liquor is sold. To permit advertising is to encourage drunkenness, not to promote temperance.

This committee bill, which purports to deal entirely with the District of Columbia, carries also a rider allowing the sale of intoxicants on military reservations, at military posts, and on ships and in places under control of the Navy Department. It repeals all existing laws on this subject. The sale of liquor in the Army and Navy throughout the Nation should be settled on its merits, and not forced through as a rider to the District of Columbia liquor control bill. I strongly oppose that provision of the committee bill.

Mr. President, if the District of Columbia license system proposed by the committee is to be the model for the cities of the United States, then all I can say is that we have learned nothing from the history of the past. We have simply gone back, or at least are simply going back by a most direct route, to all the evils of preprohibition days; and it was the terrible results of those evils, the evils of the liquor traffic as much as the evils of liquor itself, which resulted in national prohibition in the first place.

I am opposed to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and I am opposed to the liquor traffic under any guise; but the people having spoken, I am willing to go along in providing for the sale of liquor under proper safeguards in those States where a majority have voted for repeal. The enforcement act, however, should make liquor available in the interest of purchasers, not for the building up of the liquor traffic itself.

The liquor traffic is a vicious business. Again I say the profit incentive should be entirely removed from the liquor traffic. If the people are to have liquor in the District of Columbia, and they are to have liquor, they should be allowed to have liquor of good quality at fair prices.

The measure we pass should encourage temperance in the use of liquor, not attempt to encourage huge consumption and drunkenness, which is what I fear this measure proposes to do.

I shall support the amendment substituting the dispensary plan, and hope that the good sense of the Senate will adopt that amendment in the interest of good government and real temperance.

In considering legislation of such vital interest to the homes of the District of Columbia, we should heed the wishes of the parents and teachers of the District.

I have been asked to present a statement approved unanimously by the board of managers and executive committee of the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers, in which they make this appeal to the Congress:

Inasmuch as the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers is organized for the one purpose of the physical, mental, and moral education of children, our views of the control of alcoholic beverages, in the event that the sale of such becomes legal in the District of Columbia, are based entirely on safeguarding our children and our homes.

For many years the National Congress of Parents and Teachers has persistently maintained its allegiance to the cause of prohibition, and as a State branch of our national organization we have adopted the same policy.

Furthermore, we as citizens had no opportunity of expressing our views on the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, so our only concern is the protection of our children and our homes should the Congress of the United States legalize the sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

Our views are expressed in the following brief statement:

First. The control of the sale of alcoholic liquor should be through municipally owned stores only.

Second. Such sales to be only in original package.

Third. No licenses should be granted for the sale and drinking of liquor in public places in the District of Columbia.

Fourth. No alcoholic beverage shall be sold within 400 feet of any school building or educational institution, or place of worship.

Fifth. We believe, as a protection to our children and our homes, that there should be no advertising of liquor either by radio, newspapers, or any other means.

Sixth. We further oppose any solicitation of the sale of alcoholic liquor within any zone restricted to residential property.

Lastly, we believe that there should be heavy fines for the sale of liquor to minors.

Submitted by the District of Columbia Congress of Parents and Teachers by its executive committee.

HARRIET F. (Mrs. J. N.) SAUNDERS,
President.

Mr. President, I have been asked to present a statement prepared by the committee on civic affairs of the Washington Federation of Churches, representing 57,000 church members of the District of Columbia, in which they ask Congress to enact a bill providing for the dispensary system and give the following reasons for their desire:

HIGH POINTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LIQUOR BILL

1. Dispensary system against license system: (a) This being primarily a residential city and the seat of government, the promiscuous sale of bottled liquor is undesirable. The dispensary system makes liquor conveniently available in Government stores, without letting Tom, Dick, and Harry sell it. Is not the dispensary system clearly preferable for the Nation's Capital? The State of Pennsylvania has adopted it for the whole State. Please understand that under the dispensary system restaurants could sell beer, wines, and even hard liquors by the glass.

(b) Under the dispensary system the profits go to the Government and can be used for road construction, old-age pensions, relief of unemployment, etc. Is not this better than having the profits go to the liquor interests, with the danger that some of them may be used, as in the past, for bribery, kidnapping, racketeering, etc.?

2. Protection of youth: The committee bill fails to prohibit the sale of liquor near schools. We are particularly concerned about high schools. This is too important a matter to be left to anyone's discretion. The bill should contain an absolute prohibition against sale near high schools.

3. Drinking in public places: The Senate committee adopted one suggestion that drinking be prohibited on street cars, at games, and in other public places, reversing the House draft. Please support the commitee by voting for this obviously desirable restriction.

4. Advertising: Even the wets say they desire to promote temperance. To advertise liquor encourages its consumption. The Nation's Capital should not be plastered with liquor signs. Please vote for the following: "It shall be unlawful to advertise alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia except inside the places where it is lawfully sold." It is our understanding that advertising over the radio has already been prohibited, as it should be.

5. Liquor on military reservations: The committee bill contains a disgraceful rider repealing existing restrictions on the possession and use of alcoholic liquor on military reservations and in soldiers' camps. Is Congress going to encourage our soldiers and sailors to use intoxicants? Please fight this provision. Even if this were a desirable step, which it is not, legislation dealing only with the District of Columbia is no place for it.

We are confident that liquor can be made conveniently available without encouraging the use of it, and without unnecessary indecency. Even the wets ought to be satisfied with hard liquor, wine, and beer sold by the glass in every restaurant and with bottled liquor conveniently available in Government stores. Why go beyond that by pouring huge profits into the pockets of the liquor interests, selling it in stores frequented by children, permitting its sale near schools, and saying to our soldier and sailor lads: "Congress has changed its mind and now decides that intoxicants are good for you."

Respectfully submitted.

COMMITTEE ON CIVIC AFFAIRS, WASHINGTON FEDERATION OF CHURCHES,
By WILBUR LA ROE, JR., Chairman.

Mr. President, I ask for a vote on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas in the nature of a substitute for the bill reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAPPER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire now to submit two or three amendments to the bill as it was reported by the committee. On page 14, after line 14, I move to insert the following:

It shall be unlawful to advertise alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia except inside the places where they are lawfully sold.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAPPER. I desire to offer another amendment. On page 38, at the end of line 17, I move to insert the following words:

No license under this act shall allow any person to sell any beverage at any place of business less than 400 feet from a school building.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CAPPER. I have one more amendment which I desire to offer, and then I will be through.

On page 41, I move to strike out all of paragraph (c), beginning in line 5 and ending in line 20, which has to do with the repeal of the provisions as to the sale of liquor on military reservations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments to be offered, the question is, Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that the views of the minority submitted by the able Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] on the bill which has just been passed may be printed in the RECORD following the passage of the bill. I wish to state that I assent to the views therein expressed.

There being no objection, the views of the minority submitted by Mr. CAPPER from the Committee on the District of Columbia were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following minority views (to accompany H.R. 6181):

A minority of the Committee on the District of Columbia, unable to agree with the recommendation of the majority of the committee that the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, as amended by the committee, do pass, beg leave to submit the following minority views and recommendations:

The bill as reported by the committee provides for a license system of control. It is believed that the dispensary system, particularly for hard liquors, is a much more desirable method of regulating the sale of alcoholic beverages. The principal argument for such a system is that it takes the profit out of the liquor business. An amendment in the nature of a substitute has been proposed providing for the establishment of a dispensary system. An analysis of that proposal follows:

The management of the system is vested in a board of three members, appointed by the Commissioners of the District, who are to exercise the various functions, duties, and powers of the board under the supervision of the Commissioners. The salary of the members of the board is fixed at $5,000 per annum, the term of service being 5 years. No member of the board or any officer or employee thereof is permitted to have any financial interest, direct or indirect, in the business of manufacturing or dealing in alcoholic beverages.

In the case of spirits, the board is the sole agency for the dispensing of spirits within the District of Columbia. They may be sold only in sealed packages or containers, and in quantities of not more than 1 gallon at any one time to any one person.

The board may establish, maintain, and operate Government stores and warehouses at such points as it may determine and may acquire the use of any plant or equipment which it deems necessary in the conduct of its business, except a manufacturing plant. The board is required to employ chemists to determine the standard of purity and quality of all spirits to be sold by it. Sales at Government stores are to be conducted by a manager under the direction of the board and no sales are to be made in any store on Sunday or at such other times as the Commissioners may direct.

In the case of wine, the board is to purchase all wines sold in the District of Columbia and to sell the same to individuals and to persons licensed under the amendment to sell wines at retail. There is no limitation on the quantity of wines that may be sold at any one time. Licenses are provided for by the amendment for the sale of wine and beer for consumption on the premises, such licenses to be issued to hotels, restaurants, and clubs. Although the board is not permitted under the act to buy or sell beer, provision is made for licenses permitting the sale for consumption on the premises of beer purchased directly from the manufacturer or wholesaler, such licenses to be issued to hotels, restaurants, and clubs. Provision is also made for licenses permitting the sale of wines and beer for consumption off the premises, and for temporary licenses for the sale of wines and beer at banquets, picnics, and other public or private gatherings. A tax of $1 per barrel is imposed on beer.

Distillers' and winery licenses are provided for which authorize the manufacture of spirits and wines and the sale thereof to the board or to persons outside the District of Columbia for resale outside the District. Brewers', bottlers', and wholesale beer licenses are provided for in the amendment authorizing the holders thereof to manufacture and bottle and to deal directly with licensees in accordance with the regulations of the board.

Authority is also given for issuing druggists' licenses to sell alcoholic beverages upon prescription.

The fees for licenses issued under the amendment are as follows: (1) For each distiller's license, if to manufacture not in excess of 500 gallons of alcohol or spirits or both during the year in which the license is issued, $100, and if to manufacture more than 500 gallons during each year, $1,000 per annum; (2) for each winery license, $1,000 per annum; (3) for each brewery license, $1,000 per annum; (4) for each bottler's license, $500 per annum; (5) for each wholesale beer license, $250 per annum; (6) for each retail on-premises wine and beer license to a hotel, restaurant, or club, $200 per annum; (7) for each retail on-premises beer license to a hotel, restaurant, or club, $100 per annum; (8) for each retail off-premises wine and beer license, $50 per annum; (9) for each druggist license, $10 per annum; and (10) for each banquet license, $5.

The board is empowered to make all necessary regulations to carry out the provisions of the amendment, with the approval of the Commissioners. Power is also given the board to enforce the provisions of the amendment through its members, officers, and agents, and to hold hearings, require the presence of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence before it, and to institute proceedings to punish for contempt of its process.

Requirement is made that the board shall keep complete and accurate records of the conduct of its business, shall make up its accounts quarterly, and shall make annual reports to the Commissioners and such other reports as the Commissioners may from time to time require.

Funds taken in by the board from sales of alcoholic beverages and from license fees are to be deposited by the board in banks or trust companies of their own selection, subject to check by the board, and all expenses necessary for the administration of the amendment are to be paid out of such funds; except that an authorization of an appropriation of $250,000 from the Treasury is provided to enable the board to put the system in operation. The net profits derived by the board from its operations are to be paid quarterly into the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia after deducting therefrom such sums as the Commissioners may allow for the creation of a reserve fund to meet any losses incurred by the board through its operations.

The administrative and enforcement machinery is substantially as in the bill reported by the committee, including search-warrant provisions, penalties (including penalties for sales to minors, drinking in public, and operating vehicles while intoxicated).

Mr. KING. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, ask for a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. KING, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be printed with the amendments adopted by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

NOMINATION OF WRIGHT MATTHEWS—RECOMMITTAL

Mr. HARRISON. I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Wright Matthews to be Assistant to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be recommitted to the Committee on Finance. It was reported through an error.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask consent of the Senate that the speech I delivered on Monday regarding the pending treaty be printed in today's RECORD preceding the remarks I am about to make on the treaty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Monday, January 15, 1934

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the able Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], requested a quorum upon the theory that there were Senators interested in the discussion of what we speak of as the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty who possibly might be equally interested in some views that I would advance as one known to oppose the treaty. At this point I wish to say to all Senators present who are interested at all in the discussion that, as those who are opposed to the treaty have complimented me with the suggestion that I take something of the lead in the mere mechanics of the debate, I conceive it would be better that the Senators feel free to address themselves upon one subject or another, refraining if they fail to conclude their addresses to close the address, then resume the subject whenever their convenience allows, or where legislative business intervening may permit. As the discussion upon this treaty will, no doubt, take considerable time, with its many phases, and an attempt of those representing its advocacy or opposition to carry it to a final conclusion, each address would occupy such length of time on the part of each Senator as wholly to weary him and possibly weary the Senate, and would seriously interfere with the constant procedure of necessary legislative matters arising from committees and otherwise, which have a right to precedence not to be ignored.

It is for that reason I make bold, in behalf of such of my colleagues in opposition to the treaty, to make the suggestion I have made.

Mr. President, the address of the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, presenting this treaty, very fairly outlined the different grounds upon which it is assumed the ratification of the treaty by the Senate would be justified. Those favoring the treaty in the Senate, its protagonists, base their advocacy upon several grounds, not all of them agreeing with each other. Here it is sufficient to say that those who are advocating ratification feel that the treaty is justified, generally speaking, because of the economic benefits which they feel are conferred under the treaty and believe are to be derived. Therefore, for such reasons they support the treaty and present the request to the Senate for its ratification.

Mr. President, the consideration and ratification or rejection of a treaty between ourselves, the United States of America, and a foreign country constitute the most solemn duty that this honorable body is ever called upon to execute, and, conscious as our fathers were that these compacts upon any subject whenever presented as between ourselves and foreign lands carried within them the seeds of discord and possible danger of dispute and conflict, they forced upon our body the conclusion that it must take the vote of two thirds of the Membership of the United States Senate to give effect to such a document. This provision was to assure complete consideration and to secure such voice of our whole country as would impose upon the representatives of the States serious individual investigation, personal serious reflection, and then a concurring two thirds conclusion. This forethought was to obstruct a mere majority in the Senate. Swayed under partisan control or incited by immediate enthusiasm of the hour or from embittering prejudice, there might suddenly result an adoption of a treaty which, upon calm general investigation, would disclose in it all the elements of that which we had sought to avoid as breeding conflict and leading to loss of friendships and awakening of war. It is for that reason I say the ratification of a treaty is the most serious undertaking this honorable Senate has had committed to it by the Constitution of the United States and reposed in it by the people, its creator.

Mr. President, this treaty is both supported and opposed, in many instances if not in all, from the personal interest, as the advocates of the treaty see such in behalf of their constituents, or the opposition to commercial injury, as its opponents behold it.

The document is supposed and presumed to be a treaty between sovereign states. It is presented as a treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada. There is in support of this treaty a message from the President of the United States who advances the reasons justifying his conclusions. From his point of view, in support of the treaty and in justification of his request for its ratification, he tenders the reasons advanced to him by the interested States. I feel that my distinguished friend of years, the eminent President of the United States, who is such honor to his country and glory to civilization, has fallen into error, and has been misled into this fate through presumptions which are presented by the financial and economic interests which certain States advocating the treaty assume will be their enjoyment and profit. We cannot expect the President of the United States, merely because he holds the office, always to be accurate. Of him, too, if I recall the Latin, may be said:

Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus.

Or, as our Senators schooled in the classics would translate—

Sometimes even good Homer himself nods.

Mr. President, I assert that the basis of justification tendered by my honorable friends, the advocates of the treaty, and by the honorable President of the United States is founded upon a delusion.

I charge as a basis of my opposition, first, there is no legal or constitutional treaty before this body.

Second, the grounds which are proposed in behalf and in sustenance of the paper we speak of as a treaty were those which could be said to have prevailed in the minds of our countrymen 30 years ago in the first and early hope of such a document as this being brought forward in the nature of a commercial contract between countries bordering upon each other for a waterway that would float the instruments of commerce then permitted and now characterized by the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, as the barges. This possibility is upon the assumption of an advantage to shippers, and largely those who at that time assumed to be the farmers of the Middle West looking for foreign markets for their grain through a cheap rate of freight payment.

I wish to call attention at the outset to a mere statement which in itself, without unraveling it in detail, will demonstrate the fallacy engaged in this hour by those who assume a benefit respecting the freight rates. I recall the speech made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], who presented specifically instances wherein he felt the freight rates could be saved to the shippers, say, of wheat, adverting for that moment to his imperial State of Montana, whose production is a matter to be accorded to it as the most remarkable in history. But I ask this question: How will those States get their freight to this body of water if the canal were completed? They would still have to use the railroads or the motors or the aerial future freight navigation up to where they would connect with the water. The rate up to that point would be of a nature, being wholly within what is called a "short haul", allowable under the law of the Interstate Commerce Commission and that of our Government, of so great a sum that by the time their freight reached the point where it would send to the water all of the benefits which our able friends feel could be inherited by those who present their products of the farms would have been wholly overcome in nothing but the cost of reaching initial point of the water.

While I have no brief for the railroads, yet I wish to concede and have it understood that I, too, have a personal interest. I represent, in colleague with my eminent partner in the Senate, the great city of Chicago, which literally can be described as the heart of the continent. It is there that a vast number of railroads, bringing their substance from the Atlantic to the Pacific coast or from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast, break, as it were, their embargo and transfer both their freight as well as their passengers at the city of Chicago for different points in the United States, moving either westward or eastward. To that extent my very gracious and great community of course benefits by this very large contribution to labor as well as to the profits and returns to those exchanging transportation agencies. As to that it must be conceded my interest takes on that personal point of view which, representing my constituency, I admit is to their financial profit.

But I now speak to my friends, the prospective shippers, to say when you have reached the water, assuming this canal has been cut and that which you have hoped from it is on the eve of some realization, you then place your grain upon this body of water, on what ship do you place it? Your American Government unfortunately has not been able to have a fleet of American ships that could so occupy the stream to the advantage of Americans. Therefore the large number of ships, and the only ones, would be those of the foreign countries. They would be either the ships of Canada or the ships of foreign lands which had come up through the water, moved out to the ports of the Lakes, and multiplied, they consumed the profit or advantage that could have come to the American ships. This legion and army of numbers of foreign freighters in the multitudinous convoys would so completely absorb the prospect of the construction of ships upon the Great Lakes, which project the Lake States have been desiring and which have been a dream in the construction of that great country—looking to the carrying of the grain of the farmer produced in the Mississippi Valley to the most direct point where it can be transferred to those vessels that may carry it across the ocean.

Now, let it not be forgotten that if this canal be cut, as my eminent friend from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the able Senator from Montana [Mr. ERICKSON], and previously the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] have pointed out, sustained by the discussion of my able friend from Minnesota [Senator SHIPSTEAD], let this be observed: The ships that will carry this freight and land it at the ports of Europe are the large ships. They cannot come up this body of water upon the proportion that is given us of the depth alone to which it will reach. Therefore, upon a little ship, after having paid all the expenses of conveyance that landed where the water begins, then from the little ship to the big ship and then on the big ship across, we must concede the amount necessarily multiplied as making almost prohibitory any hope of profit on the part of the grower of grain and its shipper.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LEWIS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think it would be quite interesting at that point if the Senator would give us, with reference to the ships moving from United States ports to other ports, the percentage whose depth will be over 26 feet.

Mr. LEWIS. I would say to the Senator that I could not give him complete figures of all the ships exceeding the measure to which he has alluded moving from all the ports. With great deference to the query, I am compelled to respond to my able friend that that does not seem to me in any way to enlighten this particular question, as I put it, in that it is conceded that particular kinds of ships will go up this particular body of water. If there were thousands of ships launched upon the waters to the depth of those which my honorable friend would intimate, it would not relieve the situation as to the amount of expense in which these shippers are engaging for themselves.

Further, as I propose, the result will be that those ships coming in this canal would not only take—being foreign ships—this freight to Europe, if it can be taken, but on their return to the United States they would bring the goods of their country into the heart of America and by the cheapness of their processes close, by the products they could sell at our doorways, every factory in the Middle West.

When our honorable farmer and his representatives contemplate an advantage from this canal as cut into the heart of the great Mississippi Valley, may they also not conclude that ships do not return empty? They return with whatever product they can bring, either under the privilege of treaties existing in trade between ourselves and the foreign countries or in the ordinary demands of merchantmen.

Mr. PITTMAN rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does my friend from Nevada wish to interrupt me again?

Mr. PITTMAN. If I may.

Mr. LEWIS. I am glad to yield to him.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator. I have information coming from the Interstate Commerce Commission in which it is said:

> The completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will enable 70 percent of the world's ocean-going freight cargo tonnage to reach the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River ports, which serve the important industrial, agricultural, and commercial area above described.

That is to be found at page 6 of Document No. 110 of this session of Congress accompanying the President's message with regard to this matter. I shall not take the time to read the other statements in regard to tonnage, but that states that 70 percent of the world shipping may go through the canal.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am not unacquainted with the document. I understand exactly its assertion; and it merely fortifies, together with others, the charge I have made that the distinguished President has been deluded into recommending this treaty upon the presentation of certain States of the Union of supposed benefits to themselves, which in fact, upon an analysis, have no existence.

I now meet the suggestion of my honorable friend.

It is now intimated in detail that 70 percent of this traffic would pass through that canal one way or the other. Then for myself, in anxiety of patriotic support to my country, I pray that no Senator lives who, merely for a temporary gain, even in imagination or in realization, would vote 70 percent against his country, and 70 percent of the shipping and the merchandise of exchanges between his country and foreign countries to these foreign vessels which, in the nature of things as they now exist, would be the first to enjoy it; and since they enjoyed it completely there would be no hope of the American production of ships in rivalry, for there would be no market for the rival. There would be, therefore, no construction of ships. There would be, therefore, no American ships to compete.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I hesitate to interrupt the Senator, but he evidently did not understand what I read. Possibly it was poorly read.

Mr. LEWIS. No; it was not poorly read. My eminent friend never does anything poorly. It was done so well that I quickly saw its dangers.

Mr. PITTMAN. Through an error of understanding.

Mr. LEWIS. Possibly. That can arise as between myself and my eminent friend upon any matter of figures touching the matter of these ships and their carriage and their tonnage, for he has given a great deal of attention to that feature.

I now yield again.

Mr. PITTMAN. The document from which I read does not state that 70 percent of the world tonnage is foreign tonnage. It states that 70 percent of the ocean-going tonnage of the world is below 26-foot draft.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator is quite right. It does not state that it is foreign tonnage, nor that the ships would bring foreign cargoes, nor that they would be foreign ships; but, alas! we know our own condition. We know the struggles we are making to build up ships. We know the efforts in different parts of the land, upon both coasts of our country, and how difficult has it been, and, alas, in the final result, how unhappily defeated we have been in the competition. Even now it is gravely asserted that America is handicapped by the shipping bill we have, providing something of the privileges of shipping and the protection of seamen, and criticism is made of the law which is called sneeringly "the La Follette Act"—of the framing of which, pardon me, sir, I was a part in an earlier Senate; I was one of the subcommittee. To no one should more credit go than to these two dead heroes of legislation and advocates of the rights of the common poor, Senator La Follette, of Wisconsin, at that time, and Senator Williams, of Mississippi, of that time. I, by the gracious nature of the Creator, am allowed to remain as a third member where I have the honor to address this body.

I now answer my able friend, and again call attention to the fact, that being true, as asserted by my able friend, and so very true, that the able gentlemen and eminent Senators of whom I speak, who move about to put this treaty into operation, promptly remove from their country the prospects of a great merchant marine ever to be constructed; and, if constructed, with the cry against such ships as we have because of our protection of seamen, and against the method in which seamen, I may say, sir, are being mistreated in provisions of pay and comfort; add to this the cheap method of operating these ships—described by my able friend in reading this suggestion from the Interstate Commerce Commission—the ships of other lands are given position of precedence and superiority. Such makes impossible for us to hope for anything else than to see ourselves drained to the dregs by these, who take our stuff out and bring whatever stuff they can in; and place us at the disadvantage which I have described, both, sir, as to ships and as to the materials they empty at the docks along the Lakes or upon the water fronts or within the commercial cities of America.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Minnesota rise to interrogate me?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I should like to have the Senator tell us whether or not he believes that the expected monopoly of this traffic by foreign ships would apply more to the ports of this seaway or of the Great Lakes than it does to any other harbor in the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. To the contrary, I deplore to confide in this Chamber that it has worked such a complete monopoly at the Atlantic coast and at the Pacific coast that it offers a sad example to justify, fortify, and sustain the fear I express. It is the foreign ships that hold the monopoly; that come into our ports on both sides of our land, which again indicates clearly to the able Senator from Minnesota how hopeless we would be for interior navigation if the policy advocated by my eminent friend should be carried out.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Without further interfering with the Senator, I should be induced to believe that his logic would make it necessary for us to stop all shipping into the United States; to close all the ports.

Mr. LEWIS. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. My logic is that the policy that is suggested of bringing these foreign ships to our very door, and of unlading what they bring, will of itself succeed in the very thing the able Senator says he fears. It would not exactly close our ports as ports, but would close them to all hope for American vessels as victorious in the competition.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. LEWIS. I am happy to have one from the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think there is no question, from the statement of the Senator, that the city of Chicago is interested in the redistribution of freight to rail at Chicago, especially freight coming from the farther West. At the present time there is freight that is distributed at Chicago to Montreal, and after the completion of this seaway there would be freight distributed at Chicago to vessels that would pass Montreal and go to their destination. By reason of the necessity of the reshipment of freight coming through Montreal today, Montreal, being a British city, favors British ships, with the result that practically everything that moves from Montreal—and that is the head of real navigation on the St. Lawrence at present—is carried by British ships; whereas if the ocean were brought to Chicago, and Chicago there distributed the freights to boats instead of to other railroads, I think American citizens would have a greater control over the ships that the freight went into than they have now, when they have to leave and go to Montreal with this freight.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, what is to be deplored is the statement of the Senator, fortified in facts, that these ships are mostly now foreign ships going out of Montreal. They would come into our ports, and so far as bringing the products of the world in competition with America is concerned they would do so; and my able friend is right. It would work a great destruction, for awhile, as to the profits of certain railroads. It would also offer, possibly, a chance of sending shipments back upon these ships. I use the word "back", meaning the return trip; but I propound to my able friends this query:

Will Canada be found defeating herself? Will the eminent statesmen now in charge of the government of Canada—many of whom we personally know—who have shown such genius in the protection of their own people, surrender the capacity, risk being overthrown politically, to say nothing of the charge of lack of patriotism to their own neighbors? As this ship to which my eminent friend, the chairman of the committee, alludes gets down into Canadian waters with her American product, will she be treated as Canadian? Does any Member of the Senate flatter himself that Canada, with her great wheat fields stretching far up to the Northwest, leading out to Port Arthur, to the very edge of Alaska, and that great field from Saskatchewan on, where such production, if encouraged, could equal all the demand of the world—does anyone assume that Canada is going to lose the opportunity widening before her, or that she is going to allow American wheat ships to curl around in the form of an arch down through her waters, and to be landed at Liverpool at the very same rate as Canadian wheat, and at a cost that would give to America a fair competition or an equal competition with her own? Certainly not.

In the first place, we have evidence where she would not. As the very first move that Canada would make, legitimately, let it be said—we do not condemn; we merely recite—she would levy in the form of wharf charges, in the form of charges of control, or, if you please, that of boats of guidance, such rates upon the foreign shipping coming through, and our vessels, if we had any, as would give to Canada continuously the advantages of her Canadian wheat that may be landed at the mother country in England to the disadvantage of any competitor, particularly then of ourselves.

Mr. PITTMAN rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield again to the Senator from Nevada, assuming that his rise is for that purpose.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has had two thoughts. One of them is that Montreal would not permit the loss of this great reshipment traffic. I will say to the Senator that Montreal, like Chicago, has in the past opposed this treaty for the very selfish reason that she desires the reshipments at Montreal, just as Chicago desires to reship by rail.

As to the other question—that of the charges—there can be no charges under the existing treaties. This becomes an international waterway for commerce. The Lakes are open. The St. Lawrence River is open. A ship that leaves the docks at Chicago or Milwaukee or any of these places never stops at any Canadian dock from the time it leaves there until it reaches the ocean. Let the Senator take the treaties of the past and the treaties of the present and he will see that such a discrimination with regard to freights is totally impossible under those treaties.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I answer my able friend by saying that he indulges the very flattering unction that our opposing and competing nations, having made a treaty—if such is made—will obey it to its letter. No such fact exists in history.

I wish to remind my able friend what has happened. The cities to which the foreign commerce went, after the ships docked from point to point for lading or unlading, reserved the right, in the name of the conservation of health and protection as against immigration, in such matters as protection against the importation of cholera, to levy a form of duty and a form of obligation upon every one of such ships. We could not complain. They were doing that which we did on the Atlantic coast as against vessels of other nations, and as we did on the Pacific. Therefore, my able friend conceives that I mean that the Government would levy upon this traffic because it was freight, that they would not do what, as he says, would violate the letter of a treaty. They would find these other ways and means of imposing a burden as has been done under similar invitation constantly in the past.

Such is my conclusion and such is my charge, and one I beseech my fellow Senators to dwell upon as they contemplate the result which they feel would flow commercially from cutting this channel into the heart of America.

I ask, where is this grain which the eminent Senators expect to be shipped from the Northwest States to the world somewhere? Just now the great fields of Canada will produce such quantity as will quite meet the needs of all her people. Indeed, we are now meeting a surplus by cutting off the land of our farmer and paying him not to produce, because he has no market for that which he has; and we are paying for a market and paying also for the land which we ask him to abandon.

I call the attention of my able friends to that which is more important just now upon this question. Have Senators forgotten that 30 years ago this argument was made by those who propound this treaty from the State Department; and those who propound it in other quarters, and very eminent Senators who justify it upon the ground of advantages to the shipper of wheat in America? Ship it where, Senators?

Argentine at this particular time, as was seen from the report only 5 days ago, as presented in a consultation with our eminent Secretary of State, who is now representing this Government at a peaceful errand of comity, discloses her capacity to ship into England an amount of wheat sufficient for the whole of Europe. In the meantime, England presents that Australia, under her new system, together with her opportunity and her capacity, likewise produces enough to serve all the purposes of the colonies of Great Britain and those of Germany and France, if the new methods can be adopted, and if they can be developed, and the people have resources sufficient to carry them to the legitimate results of their now new movement and new improvised method of cultivation. Where will we have a market?

May I ask Senators whether they will fail to recognize that in India and in Egypt England has proceeded with great wisdom in tendering such sum of subsidy to these of her people that she has lifted up the fellah from Egypt, and literally made a free man of the once slave of India. Both of such are now out in the field planting, sending forth his grain, receiving in his pocket the benefit of the subsidy which England has produced, after which system we seem to have modeled in some form. These facilities when completed will not only serve the purposes of Europe but I entertain serious fear, living in a State where all forms of grain are produced, with State neighbors whose citizens make a specialty of raising corn and wheat, but particularly wheat and rye. I see the prospect of not only serving the world through these foreign lands which I have described, by the aid of capitalists, but through their capacity—through these very ships from foreign waters coming into the lands by a waterway cut through the heart of my land—they would topple their grain at our shores at such small price at the very doors of America as would result in suppressing completely the hopes of the American farmer, as it would destroy his prospect of return of the prosperity he now prays for.

I call attention to the fact that I am unable to see wherein this hope of advantage of our honorable friends can be justified; and I now up to this point have omitted China and Russia. China is just awakening. Her people, from a long sleep of centuries, seem to have been able to adopt systems of government now modern to the world. She has become a land of warriors. She has become also the advocate of a form of agricultural improvement, under the suggestions of England, which has a very large domain of territory in China. There is her neighbor, Russia. Add Russia to this computation, for we have noted the development of Russia and must allow for the future agricultural development of Russia and Siberia, and the great stretch of land all the way right up until it reaches China itself. I beseech you to contemplate those lands and their production under the new system now prevailing in Russia, and that now by England advocated in China. Where, Mr. American, will you look for the foreign trade which you say will justify your paying from three hundred million to a billion dollars out of your pockets in the prospect of a development from which you hope of new water roads for grain shipment within 10 years, or 20 years, or in the life of some immediate generation to enjoy?

Mr. PITTMAN rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Nevada wish to interrogate me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator seems to be obsessed with the idea that there is nothing but wheat to be shipped over this line of waterway, whereas as a matter of fact the Interstate Commerce Commission, which has made a study of this matter at the request of the President, certifies the following:

> It is reasonable to believe, therefore, that at least 80 percent of the new traffic that will be developed by the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will be domestic commerce moving between the ports of the Great Lakes and the existing ports on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

Mr. LEWIS. I realize that the report of the Commission expresses some hope that was harbored in the bosom of the writer of the report, who was solicitous to support this treaty. However rejoicing this hope in its form of expression, there is nothing to justify it in the past that was ever realized, and I am unable to see in the future any relief from the burdens and difficulties such as we have seen have been the experience of the days gone by.

My able friend from Nevada says that I see only wheat. I remarked upon my own great State, the State represented by my eminent colleague and myself, where we produce every form of grain; and I remarked that in the Mississippi Valley is a belt of States coiled together against the great Mississippi River, and that it was these for which I speak, and they producing all kinds of grain, it was for all they produced, and the dangers which they inherited that I expressed a fear.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, the principal object of this treaty and the building of this canal is to cheapen transportation. Does the Senator think that because there are possibilities, such as he has described, in foreign countries which are going to produce wheat that will supply the world, that is sufficient justification now for our refusing to take this step, if it will cheapen transportation, and does he think that it will cheapen transportation?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from Nebraska, whose great interest in the subject I know. Before I do answer the Senator's question directly, I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I am speaking to one known as GEORGE NORRIS, Senator from Nebraska, of whom I delight to say, dating from my experiences with him, beginning when we were Members in the House of Representatives together, and now continuing all the way through to his serious service in the Senate in our joint company, I, upon this knowledge, assert that Senator GEORGE NORRIS, of the United States Senate, is the most useful single legislator in any parliament of the English-speaking world. [Applause by Senators.]

Now, Mr. President, I respond to his query. I say that if it were true that through cutting this channel of water freight rates could be reduced, and if they were reduced upon the basis proposed by the proponents, of 4 cents on the 400,000,000 bushels of grain which go out, and that saved the 4 cents to 6 cents, or 11 cents, according to the computation of eminent Senators supporting this treaty—I am taking the speeches of different Senators—then contemplate the expense. My eminent friend, the able young Senator from Wisconsin, a very distinguished descendent of his distinguished father, gave us the figure as $112,000,000, in his judgment. Others have gone so far as to figure that the relative rate America would have to pay would bring the figure to $300,000,000—others up to $1,000,000,000——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Illinois does not wish to misquote me. I stated in the speech I made in discussing this subject last spring—and that is the speech to which I assume the Senator from Illinois refers—that I calculated the new cost to the Treasury of the United States at approximately $168,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS. Assuming the Senator to be accurate; that is, instead of being $136,000,000, the Senator said $168,000,000, I again say that if it were $168,000,000 or $268,000,000, the figure of the able Senator from Wisconsin was the lowest figure that I found in those debates. I am quoting from my memory of those debates as I heard them. All of the references I have made are from my memory of the debates, and if I am wrong in any respect, having refreshed my mind by reading them wherever I could, I pray the Senator to have no hesitancy in correcting me.

If there is saved 6 cents, or 11 cents, as is proposed, and then the sum of money is paid out, figured from the $168,000,000 to which the able Senator from Wisconsin alluded, to the amount of $500,000,000, as some have contended, or $300,000,000, as others have contended, added to which are the official charges of maintaining the construction after it has been built, to where it would reach ultimately $1,000,000,000; cutting that in half and giving the average at $300,000,000 to $500,000,000, then I answer the Senator from Nebraska that the man who produces the grain, the farmer upon whose wealth the taxes are levied by his county, his State, as well as his Nation, to meet the amount of tax that will be laid upon him, pays $1.38 for the 4 cents that he saves, and he pays $3.85 for the 11 cents that he saves.

Pray, in heaven's name, when he is saved the rate, if it be true that he could, as my eminent friend from Nebraska hopes that he will—and only because he believes he will would he support the doctrine—he, because of the taxes which he and his children will have to pay for the great amount necessary to construct this adventure, is out a sum of money such as to bankrupt him in his hopes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). To whom does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to direct the Senator's attention to the summary of information which accompanied the President's message, which is to be found on page 3 of Senate Document No. 110.

Mr. LEWIS. I have it here.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. These are the most recent of the official figures from the executive departments now available to the Senate. If the Senator from Illinois will permit me to trespass upon his time I should like to read briefly from that document.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin objectively that I have the data of which he is speaking. I was referring to it partly here, and if he will let me know to what particular point he alludes I think I can concede it for the purpose of my argument.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to allude to the question of cost which the Senator from Illinois has been discussing. On page 3 appears the following statement:

> The total United States share of the cost of completing this waterway to open the Great Lakes to ocean-going commerce under the treaty is estimated at $272,453,000, including the development of 1,100,000 horsepower on the United States side of the international rapids. Of this, it is proposed, under the terms of the joint resolution which has already passed the House of Representatives, that $89,726,750 be assumed by the State of New York as representing the cost which may fairly be allocated to the power project. This would place the total net cost to the United States for the entire project under the treaty at $182,726,250.
> The annual cost of the seaway to the United States, including interest at 4 percent, amortization of 50 years, operation and maintenance, is estimated by the Corps of Engineers at $9,300,000. This amounts to an annual cost of 7.4 cents per capita for the population of the United States and 23.2 cents per capita for the seaway area.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to my able friend that I have been very much attracted by the estimates which have been proposed by those who advocate the treaty and by those who have sent estimates from the State Department. I recall, as I did when I had occasion to study them again, that these are the same who made estimates upon the Hoover Dam, the costs on which ran from $500,000,000 to nearly $2,000,000,000 in excess of their estimates. These eminent experts are the gentlemen who made their estimates of the Panama Canal, the cost of which, as the Senator knows, was one hundred or more millions in excess of the estimates. This is the prognostication which they offer as a justification from their point of view. The Senator will concede with me that there are several engineers in these hearings who differ from this source of supply; but which is right it is, of course, hard for any of us to conceive. We only know that in all of these conjectures there has never been but one small, insignificant instance where accuracy or completeness was shown in these representations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator suffer a further interruption?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator, of course.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I say to the Senator that the estimates to which I have just referred were made by the Corps of Engineers, and insofar as I know there is no more disinterested authority which can pass upon the question of estimates in this regard.

May I say that these estimates, as I think the Senator is perhaps aware, are based on 1926 cost figures. We have had some test of how those estimates are proving out in actual construction, for the Congress has already appropriated $14,000,000 for the deepening of the down-bound channel of the Great Lakes system.

The point to which I am trying to direct the attention of the Senator from Illinois is, that up to this point Congress has already appropriated $14,000,000 for the deepening of the downbound channel. Those estimates, like the estimates for the seaway itself, are based on the 1926 price level, and according to the testimony of then Colonel Markham, who was in direct charge of this construction project, and who is now Chief of Engineers of the Army, those 1926 price level estimates were proving to be about 50 percent excessive in the construction work which was being done. I submit that there is tangible, definite evidence that upon the basis of the 1926 price level these estimates furnished by the Corps of Engineers for the cost of this project certainly err, if they err at all, upon the side of conservatism and safety.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it was no intention of mine to unnecessarily veer away into the matter of the table of mathematics and the multiplication table, but I should like to answer the Senator about this point. These engineers have made different reports from time to time, but I ask the Senator if he will not recall that while we all certify to the splendid character of Colonel Markham—who I hope soon will be made a general—he has made three different estimates directly opposed to each other. I happen to have been drawn closely into the controversy in a lake-levels case before the Supreme Court of the United States, where I was one of counsel, touching the matter of Chicago, or the State of Illinois, in the suits brought by the State of Wisconsin and her colleagues, touching all of these questions.

I now wish to answer the Senator on another point. I expected the Senator from Wisconsin to name Colonel Pillsbury, who made a speech in Philadelphia before the Organization on Political Science, in which he made an estimate according to his honest judgment at that time.

Several months elapse. This treaty is brought forward under President Hoover, and in the desire of these engineers to be in harmony with their chief they make up a completely new set of figures. Events have changed, let us say. Prices have changed. They may have justified them, but it must not be overlooked how absolutely unreliable as a fixed and sure estimate are the estimates of these engineers.

One word further. How can an American engineer know when he passes down into Canada, the amount we are going to bear of expense in the millions upon millions and hundreds of millions to pay the expense for Canada, that work being done by Canada, paid in Canada to Canadian workmen—how does an American engineer have any idea of capacity by which Canada would be able to inform him or about which he could inform us as to what would be the cost and expense levied in Canada? Therefore I do not attach, I might say, great importance to it, much respect as I have for the gentlemen themselves.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. VANDENBERG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield first to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I merely wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that, so far as any estimates are available in this connection, I believe the Congress must rely upon the estimates of the Corps of Engineers. They certainly are the most disinterested individuals who have to pass upon various projects the construction of which the Government undertakes. We had to rely upon them for the estimates as to the cost of the Illinois waterway, which I have advocated.

Mr. LEWIS. It is to that that I alluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We have to rely upon their estimates as to the cost of improving the rivers and harbors along the Great Lakes and the coast; we have to rely upon that able, efficient Corps of Engineers for estimates upon every public project which is undertaken for the improvement of rivers and harbors and for the development of our commerce and our waterways; and, so far as I am concerned, I should much prefer to take their estimates than I should to take the estimates of engineers retained by parties in interest, or who think they are in interest in this case, and who have not made such a thorough study as the Corps of Engineers have made into this project over a course of years, but who have, of necessity, made a cursory and superficial examination.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I join with my friend from Wisconsin in any tribute to the Corps of Engineers as such, we respect them as meaning well, but I cannot accept what they call their estimates as fixed facts and as having been so adjudicated as to become fixed in truth. I cannot overlook that they constitute mere guesses on their part, varying from time to time; nor can I overlook, as my able friend well submits, that other engineers, though they were engaged some by the State of New York, some by individual ports and cities, some by commercial bodies, find themselves greatly at variance with our governmental engineers. The fact remains that assuming them all to be sincere, there is such a variance that, adopting a middle ground, we will not escape $500,000,000 being laid upon us in a single sum, in addition to the vast billions which now represent a deficit and which will be laid upon the American people in the hope that a dream may be realized in the lifetime of some now living, to their benefit, though in this vision we have no evidence that there can ever follow, as a matter of fact, a realization.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator has referred to the great variance in the estimates as between reputable engineers. I confess that I have wondered how it were possible for reputable engineers, figuring upon the same project, to differ to the extent that these estimates have indicated.

Mr. LEWIS. I have likewise wondered at that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is familiar with Colonel Cooper's estimates which have been repeatedly referred to inimically and prejudicially so far as the seaway prospectus is concerned.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Michigan no doubt remembers that Colonel Cooper gave his testimony before our committee when the able Senator from Michigan and myself were present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, indeed. I know the Senator's anxiety for the truth. Last night I telegraphed Colonel Cooper and asked him how it was possible this variance could exist. I call the Senator's attention to Colonel Cooper's reply, and I suggest that it might put us on our guard in respect to the quotation of these various figures. Colonel Cooper says:

[Telegram]

NEW YORK, N.Y., January 15, 1934.

Senator A. H. VANDENBERG,
Senate Office Building:

Answering your telegram regarding alleged differences between my estimated cost of St. Lawrence project and War Department's estimates. My estimate of $1,450,000,000 made in December 1920, after several years of intensive field and office study, included cost of developing 6,600,000 horsepower between Lake Erie and Montreal, whereas the War Department estimate you probably refer to takes in only the two stage power development, aggregating 2,200,000 horsepower in the international rapids division of the St. Lawrence River.

HUGH L. COOPER.

I submit to the Senator that this conclusively demonstrates that we should hear no more about Colonel Cooper's billion-dollar estimate respecting this particular project in opposition to the estimates of the War Department, because Colonel Cooper now advises us that the two propositions upon which the estimates are based are not the same propositions at all.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have stated, in answer to my able friend, the eminent Senator from Wisconsin, that we cannot overlook the fact that there are variances in the figures caused by differences as between them in point of time and differences in costs according to the time when the estimates were made. I now speak of Colonel Cooper; that he includes the item of water power in computing on the undertaking may be conceded, but likewise do the engineers of our own Government enter into the same prospect, and they call attention to it in their respective figures, and while they do not add the figures on that account to the sum that is estimated for the mere cut of the channel, when the figures are placed in their proper columns and then placed in final summing, there is not much difference as each suggests the fear or the hope in respect to the figures. But, in either event, let me answer the able Senator, I am interested to learn of this intimation as to Colonel Cooper.

Colonel Cooper is a very bad man when it comes to his estimates in the case of this project when they are favorable to the contention of those who oppose it on the ground of its excessive cost, among other things, but he is a very able and very efficient man whose estimates and reports are to be wholly accepted as to Russia and the construction of engineering plants there, presented to us as a compensation for the accord that we are to give Russia. It all depends as to when and where the individual is produced as to what credit we give him. Therefore, Mr. President, it is merely indicated again how unreliable all the estimates are. But as this question is before us, taking the figures of all the engineers, should we attempt to expend this money that will go to the advantage of our neighbor—as much as we love our neighbor and desire her to have her prosperity—money extracted from our own selves at a time like this when our people are overburdened with taxes, borne down to the ground, helpless in their efforts, hopeless in their future? Is there justification for it before the American public, or will it be looked upon as a specious form of robbery? Will not the citizen ask, "What reason is there at this particular time for this peculiar expenditure? Why should we have been mortgaged at this particular time? Where is the emergency? Where is the call at this particular time that it should have been so hastened and put upon us?

My able friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] delivered last session an address from this floor in support of this treaty, and however many addresses may be delivered, there will be none superior to it. It covered every field, but I cannot forget that the able Senator from Michigan found it agreeable to rest his advocacy upon the effect very largely of this possible undertaking upon the great State of Michigan.

In the concluding portion of his address he brought forth splendid illustrations as to how the automobile product of his great city of Detroit, and of the great city of Flint, and, indeed, of the great State of Michigan, would receive benefits by what he conceived to be a difference in the cost of landing automobiles carried to foreign ports over the proposed new route as compared to the rates now charged. Thus we see, sir, that in most of these instances our eminent friends are laboring under the illusion of hope of a benefit to their people, upon the prospect of something they calculate within themselves, whereas there is nothing to demonstrate, there is no proof anywhere subject of verification that such will be the case; for when the plant is cultivated, let us say—when the channel has been cut, let us say—and the undertaking has been completed and the public has had to pay the expense, when the taxes have been taken from the taxpayer and the burdens have been put upon the country, how, then, does the mere saving of $2.85 to the automobile manufacturer benefit him, when he has a heavy tax laid upon him to meet it? What will he say when the saving and cost are in the ratio of 3.50 to 3.25? I wish to have it understood that I have worked very hard in making out these figures, for the multiplication table and myself are not at all in harmony.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator be good enough to put the computation in the RECORD? I follow his eloquence but not his mathematics.

Mr. LEWIS. The mere fact that my friend cannot figure in more harmony with myself demonstrates that Michigan has not as harmonious an attitude as has Illinois. I trust that it may soon obtain such. I will say to the Senator from Michigan the figures will go in the RECORD. I regret that this RECORD has to contain so much assumingly in justification of this adventure. I feel it will never be excused in behalf of those who present it.

But, Mr. President, apart from this little persiflage and pleasantry between my friend and myself, we come now to the next phase. It is said, in justification of this treaty, that there is to be developed under this project great water power. Water power! Water power! Where is my eminent friend, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the great advocate of Government control of water power? Here, Mr. President and Senators, I beseech your kind attention for a moment to rather a novel situation. I have never seen such a pursued course of governmental seduction as has been indicated in this suggestion of water power. Thirty years ago, 27 years ago, 22 years ago, 18 years ago, and 11 years ago, not one suggestion is to be found in the intimations when this movement for treaty for the St. Lawrence waterway was attempted of this water power. One single expression known as "hydroelectric" can be found. What is the reason then if it can be justified and is justifiable as a mere matter of freight saving? What is the idea of inserting this water power?

These eminent advocates, our honorable neighbors in Canada, with their typical shrewdness, saw water power had become a great issue in America. It was the most seducing issue possible. It politically made and unmade statesmen. It created in one form and another political platforms. Consequently in the last suggestion, apart from "the benefits of trade", the "benefits of reduced freight rates", is injected "water power." Why water power? Because it was assumed that this is the time when America is interested in water power, and however much this adventure of the treaty could not be justified upon the basis of freight rates, it could be presented under the illusory seduction of water power.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LEWIS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The reason why the water power has become a part of this project is due to the magnificent fight made by the present President of the United States when he was Governor of the State of New York. He saw an attempt on the part of the great private power interests to seize this great natural resource, and he launched a campaign in the State and in the legislature which resulted in the creation of the New York Power Authority and the enactment of legislation which assured in perpetuity, if this power shall be developed, that it shall be developed for the benefit of the people of the State of New York and in that great northeastern industrial area within transmission distance of the power site.

The Senator from Illinois I am sure would not wish to detract from that great achievement of the present President of the United States. I think it is to his everlasting credit that he made that fight in the State of New York, and that he is now determined that when this great block of power—may I say the largest block of hydroelectric power on the North American continent, larger than Muscle Shoals and Boulder Dam combined—is developed, it shall be developed in the public interest. The question of power being a part of this project or a phase of it is not due, as the Senator from Illinois suggested, to the cunning or to the wisdom of officials in Canada. It is due to the magnificent efforts and the splendid uncompromising fight made by President Roosevelt when he was Governor of the State of New York.

Mr. LEWIS. I hear the Senator from Wisconsin. I understand what he would intimate. But my respect for the President, together with my affection, my great endorsement of his wondrous designs, make it impossible for me to accept the suggestion that he would ask the Government of the United States of America to spend from $300,000,000 or $500,000,000 to $1,500,000,000 of all the people of all the States merely to secure extra water power for the people of the State of New York. If it were really come to the point that his interest in this undertaking is for water power, and the water power referred to in this treaty, by which that power, or the consequences of this water power is but to go to the State of New York as a single assemblage of people, then I answer a little arrangement for water power between Canada and New York could be effected by an ordinary little compact.

But let me answer the Senator. The water power suggested in this treaty goes to Canada and not to the United States. We get 11 percent. They get the remainder. How then, may I ask the able Senator from Wisconsin, who, like the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], has ever been the advocate of Government control of water power, can the United States control Canada by which we can have Government control of water power under the Government of Canada? How can the Government of the United States have the Government control for which those eminent Senators fight and for which I have fought with them whenever I could?

I point out that this matter of water power presented for the support of the treaty, however sincere the efforts of the President, is injected into the treaty as a specious form of seduction of public mind in America, which, having been awakened to the matter of water power, can be allured upon the theory that whatever they lose in the millions they are paying Canada for the water power can be made up through the great benefits to be derived from water power.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator rise to interrupt me again? I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to correct the Senator by reference to the fact that the development will make available 5,000,000 kilowatt-hours of primary power and 700,000 of secondary power, the total being equivalent approximately to half the electricity consumed in the State of New York in 1932.

I also wish to invite attention to the fact that within transmission distance of the power development, which is to be carried on by the State of New York, lie the States of New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. I, therefore, do not think it fair of the Senator from Illinois to state that this is a development contemplated only in the interest of the people of New York.

If the Senator will suffer a further interruption——

Mr. LEWIS. Believe me, the Senator from Illinois finds it no suffering to hear the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should acknowledge at once that I cannot compete with the language employed by the Senator from Illinois. I was simply trying to be at least half as courteous as he always is.

The Senator made some reference earlier in the debate to the statement that the cost of the Panama Canal had exceeded the estimates. While I am perfectly willing to admit that prior to the time the plans and specification for the Canal had become definite and complete as being the plans and specifications for that project, there was discussion of it costing something like $150,000,000 more or less, yet in 1908 when the Army engineers had carefully gone over the plans and specifications they estimated to Congress that the Canal would cost $375,201,000. The final cost after the Canal was completed was $372,391,853.92. Therefore it would seem to me hardly fair to the record of the Army engineers not to have in this record a statement showing that their actual estimates, after the plans and specifications had been completed, were approximately $3,000,000 under the estimates of cost of 1908.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator that $215,000,000 was added on the ground that the improvement of Gatun Dam was not what was previously expected, and therefore accounted for that extra expense. But my able friend is limiting himself, without being conscious of it, only to the part which was ascribed to the Panama Canal.

How utterly unreliable would it be for us to adopt the mere estimates on the part of the Army engineers when it is shown that one estimate in 1920, one in 1926, and one in 1928, were all of them so different, and therefore among the things to be disregarded. But the question is, without regard to what the estimate is within these hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars, without any esteem as to the manner of man who makes them, granting every form of credit to their capacity and integrity, where does the justification for the expenditure lie upon the basis of any of them? That is the point I press.

I come back again to where I was with water power. Even if the water power could be extended to all those New England States referred to by the able Senator from Wisconsin, I still have the proposition that the enjoyment of the water power in those States can only be had through some agreement with Canada, because the majority control of the power is in Canada. We have a commission of 6, 3 of the United States and 3 of Canada. They need only have a tie, each standing for his own country, and nothing is done. The parliamentary body of Canada then takes its action and before those States could get any benefit, even assuming the element of power, they would have to negotiate with the State of New York and then with the Government of Canada.

We have the Hoover Dam with its large instrumentalities. We now have Muscle Shoals. We have developed great quantities of water power there. Now, since science is moving I must not overlook the fact that it is now gravely proposed that sea water, by a form of science, now is being extracted of its power by which the sea itself shall furnish power, wherein the water may be drawn in contraction to represent a vast source of water power, making unnecessary any of these arrangements even if it were possible in their undertaking.

But, now, as to Canada: Canada is not interested, as far as we are concerned, in building American water power. What is this delusion that we are laying to ourselves? What is this unction that we press to the heart? What interest has Canada in seeing our water power developed, and the manufactories of our country multiplied to her disadvantage? Will it be conceived that Canada is going to contract to us the water power, even though we pay for it, in such sum as to give such an advantage to us, over here, as will displace her manufactories in any advantages she may have under them? Certainly not. She has a surplus of water power. She is able to contend even now, sir, that she has a situation far in excess of any other land around us for the benefit of improvement in water power.

I therefore say to you we are not deluding Canada. And now, Senators, hear me, that you may realize how Canada is not being deluded—all of Canada.

Canada has not approved this treaty. Canada's Parliament has been four times in session—twice in regular session; twice called for other reasons. Why has not this treaty been presented? It was concluded. The eminent President of the United States preceding the present President had recommended this treaty. This treaty came from the Foreign Relations Committee. The Parliament of Canada is still in session. Why has Canada refused to approve this treaty if it has the benefits and advantages that are asserted? If it is so beneficial to the United States, then it must be said that it was declined to be approved because, as our eminent friends contend, it would be to such advantage of her rival. Therefore, we have no reason to hope it ever will be approved by her if it would not be upon that ground in the past.

Then, Mr. President, may we not assume the other reason? Then Canada has other reasons why she has not approved it.

Now, Mr. President, hear me: It is said that one part of Canada is opposing this treaty because politically it is opposed to the other part of Canada. Let us concede that. Let us say that as a matter of racial instinct, the early inheritance of the French—who, having settled Canada, were overcome by English power—these children of the French in the second generation, the third and fourth, still adhere to their feeling, and that they are opposed to this treaty bebecause it is contended it works only to the advantage of that part of Canada which we can describe as the country around Toronto; and if they have been so effective in their objections that up to the present time there has been no approval by Canada, we are then met with this: Why is this treaty brought to us, that we should approve it first? That the fact of the United States having approved it can be used as some leverage and power to enforce its approval by Canada.

This, sir, must be said: In this treaty are many provisions of reciprocal obligation. We will assume that we proceed, and we spend some hundreds of millions of dollars. The Government of Canada changes—speaking of government in the sense we speak of an administration—and we have the present Government overturned, headed by the eminent Premier Bennett, and have it superseded by a government from Quebec, as was done when Sir Wilfred Laurier overcame the administration of Sir John A. McDonald. Where then, sir, when our money is all gone, and the work only half done, and every dollar out of our pockets, and Canada refuses to proceed further, saying, "We were not for this in the beginning. You saw it, gentlemen of America. You, of the United States Senate, saw that we had declined to ratify this undertaking. Whatever reasons we had, we did not do it, as you have noticed." Right; there was some reason, and therefore the Canadian Government has a right to say, "We will not do it now." Where then is your money, Senators? Gentlemen of America, where then is your justification? Where then is the execution of your contract? And if you say that Canada will ratify, assuming that Canada will ratify—and I will assume so—Canada would then be called on to ratify as a matter of comity to the United States Government for having passed the treaty, and out of courtesy; but the spirit against the treaty, the opposition to carrying out the obligations of debt provided in it, so far as Canada is concerned, would still remain, while we should be out all our millions, with no power in the world by which we could induce compliance and obedience by Canada.

Mr. President, I have called to your attention these situations; but I now come to the point I wish to press severely, because severe it is.

Senators, you who do me the courtesy to credit me at least with sincere opposition to this treaty, I come to you bringing you what I feel is the tragic threat there is in this treaty.

Do you flatter yourselves that for these 22 years the Government of Great Britain was interested in the water power that is now suggested to the United States? Do you console yourselves that the Government of Great Britain was anxious about a waterway being cut through, if our honorable friends are correctly stating their position, that would so benefit America in her shipment? What interest do you feel, my fellow Senators, is that of Great Britain, by which she should be urging the construction of this waterway under this undertaking slowly, slowly but surely during all these years, and then in the lapse nothing done? And why now, Senators, immediately after the World War, does Britain hasten under one name or the other, as I pointed out a moment ago, when the cry of cheapness of freight might not prevail, to inject the seductive allurement of water power into the treaty? Do you feel, you eminent gentlemen, educated and learned in the affairs of your Government, that this is the motive of Great Britain?

I believe it is in the tenth chapter of Matthew that we find the expression of the Holy Scripture, in the New Testament:

> There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, and hid, that shall not be known.

We will meet this in the language of the shades of Hamlet and the trembling individual, as he fancies above and beyond him something that gave him design of fear, crying out:

> I'll cross it though it blast me.

The World War is concluded. The statesmen of Great Britain are learned and eminent, long schooled in diplomacy. They have for 130 years been compelled to anticipate conflict, and in this anticipation have prepared for it wherever they could. No preparation has taken the form more mathematically or more consecutively than in seizing, wherever they could legitimately, avenues of water, for Great Britain has ever lived in the prospect of a developing shipping trade. That has been the theme on which she has survived and the theory on which she has made manifest great success, but she has also been able to use her waters wherever they could be controlled by such agencies as defended her, and in the event of assault or anticipated assault to assail another.

Why, think you, did England move out under Disraeli to seize the Suez Canal and overtake France if it were not that she might control the water, in order that her ships might find a channel for the purposes either of defense in the maintenance of her rights in Egypt or the protection of her commerce on its road to India? Do you fail to recall the artfulness of this very able country? The World War was on you. Where is the German today who will not pause to realize that when the then Kaiser found it agreeable to join with England in an arrangement that created the Kiel Canal, that seemed then only for commercial purposes and the transportation of freight, now he remembers Jutland and the destruction of his German ships by English assault?

Can you forget that in the Panama Canal we had agreed among our own people that we should give freedom of tolls to America, and not one word to the contrary was said? The eminent statesman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], sitting near us, honoring my argument with his attention, he whom we all delight to honor as our colleague for the splendor of reputation he possesses, was serving in those days both in public place and in conventions; he with us will remember that when the late President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, in his speech in New Jersey, promised, as a part of the platform and declaration for democracy, to the farmers of the land that they should enjoy the Panama Canal free of tolls, he meant it, and we of the service of the party which he represented likewise meant it. Who of us now will recall that one word of protest was ever uttered on the part of our honorable rivals, England, Canada, or any part of the British Empire, while the campaign was on? Who of you will note that any word was ever said, but which of you will not fail to note that silence, as though it were entombed, was all we had? But when we had finished, and the election had come about, democracy was successful, and there was the demand to carry out this undertaking, England brought forth an arrangement of treaty by which she proved, in the language of it, that we could not grant freedom from tolls to our own vessels without a discrimination in violation of her rights in the Panama Canal; and President Wilson, conscious of his obligation to a serious situation as well as to the sacred treaty, was compelled to recommend to our body to reverse its position and to repeal the law that would have given freedom from tolls. We obeyed the behest.

Do you not remember how our eminent rival had maintained a quietude when we were struggling for what was called the Nicaragua Canal and resting our rights under a treaty called the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty? Not one word came from our honorable rival, as was her privilege; but so soon as we began to execute the plan for a canal, she came forward by presenting a treaty she had that would have enabled her to cut a canal parallel with our own, and claimed rights equal to our own. Finally the controversy was temporarily disposed of by our assuming a new system in purchasing the interest of France, and thus the Panama Canal was constructed.

Do not Senators realize that during all these matters to which I am alluding, England had for her object her self-protection and the protection of her empire? What think you is the purpose, then, that she should constantly and continuously now, after the World War, demand the execution of this treaty, but not in the name of Canada? This is not a reciprocity treaty made between the honorable President of the United States—as was done in President Taft's administration—and Canada, for a mere exchange of goods upon a certain basis. It is not such a treaty as one my eminent friend from Michigan must recall, having to do with the Welland Canal, for the mere exchange of compacts for navigation between our own country and Canada. What is the meaning of this situation? I hesitate to present it, but duty calls on me to present it as I feel it in the deep vitals of my life.

Canada enters into these reciprocal obligations, but no Canadian signs the treaty. The Minister who was here signed as Minister, but we find ourselves making a treaty with the Empire of Great Britain. The Empire of Great Britain steps in and makes herself a party to a treaty which has to do with water power for America and Canada. The Empire of Great Britain steps in and makes herself party to a treaty covering the mere matter of reducing freight rates on the farmer of Montana and the Northwest. So it seems too ridiculous to assume such great parties to so "little a project."

Let us not delude ourselves. England sees, as she has ever seen with great wisdom, the difficulties of tomorrow, and a former British Ambassador to this country, Sir Esme Howard, a man who served here at Washington—an eminent gentleman, learned and able, not one calculated to explode on moment's excitement—seeing the situation and knowing it as his country saw it, delivering an address last Saturday at London—I read from the New York Times of Sunday—said:

> It is useless to disguise any longer the fact that the general condition of Europe is perhaps even more unsettled than just before the Great War.
> The danger spot may shift, but there are, in addition to far eastren conflicts, plenty of causes of trouble in Central Europe to cause grave uneasiness, without mentioning Balkan uncertainties and occasional disturbances in Latin America, while over all hands the ever-menacing thundercloud of Soviet Russia, about which it seems impossible to get definite or trustworthy information.
> Neither the adjourned economic conference, now more like a corpse than a living body just taking a rest, nor the Disarmament Conference, which has acquired the habit of adjourning, is likely ever to accomplish much for the recovery of the world.

What is the future this eminent British statesman sees, and what are the causes he felt justified him, as a former Ambassador to the United States, learned in the events, to refer to it in public places, if it had not been that he knew he was voicing the exact expression and feeling of the statesmen in control of his Government?

Mr. President, there is, as he says, Russia, a difficult problem. As he says, it has been ascertained and measured. But England did measure it when Russia moved out on the eve of taking Turkey, which would have led to a course that would have given India into the control of other nations, particularly then Germany. England moved out and joined through the water course and entered into the war which we now speak of as the Crimean, for the mere avoidance of the success of Russia.

Now, sir, how stands your country? There is Russia. She has been acknowledged by our country and by other countries of the world. Does any one here fancy that Russia is going to remain quiet and let her people live under the humiliation of having been defeated by Japan? Does anybody deny to himself that Russia will feel that the way to hold her people to her, and to avoid prospect of further revolutions on the part of her people, is to hold them by the hope that there is conflict just ahead in which they will be rewarded? Does anyone assume that Russia is going to sit quiet and allow this situation of national humiliation to remain, conscious of the feeling that is awakened in her people in Russia, and expressed by her people everywhere?

Mr. President, England did not want war with South Africa. It was not until she met defeat in a conflict that she was compelled, out of the pride of her people, to return to the conflict, and at the expense of much blood finally to celebrate Ladysmith.

France had no desire for what developed a world war. It was the loss of Alsace-Lorraine under which her people rankled, and there were ever the prongs which prodded her; her people were a dishonored and humiliated people, and the war was fought for the remedying of yesterdays and the restoration of the tomorrows in glory, where before the people felt they were suffering in defeat and dishonor.

Do you feel today, then, that England does not see that conflict can arise? There is Japan. When Japan had conflict with Russia, England was her ally. England at that time was under an understanding with Japan, and it remained; and when we gave up the right to the defense of the Philippines in a most deplorable proceeding that transpired in a foreign city and here at Washington, England gave out to the countries that she had severed the treaty she had had with Japan, and it was true; but she promptly revived the treaty in different language to preserve her interests, and Japan came out and accused England of bad faith. We do not. England had a right to take such steps as she chose; and while she gave us to understand that she had withdrawn from the treaty with Japan, we recognized that as an illustration of the attitude of withdrawal from relations such as previously existed between herself and Japan, as she was anxious to have us know that she bore no relations with Japan by which we could assume that, should conflict arise between Japan and the United States, we also would have England as an enemy or rival because of her alliance. But afterwards England was compelled to make the relation all anew. Does not Russia know that? Does not England know that?

Then behold your country. When Great Britain came forward to have this treaty presented, ostensibly in the name of Canada, when she stepped in in the name of the Empire, in the name of Great Britain, Scotland, and Ireland, and gave a sovereign endorsement to the treaty, and presented it in the sovereign imperial name, was that done for the mere purpose of securing a slightly reduced rate on wheat to Canada, or waterpower where we can rival Canada? Has it ever been done before?

My eminent friend the Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, may not have heard of the investigation; but there sit around me eminent Senators who recall that when we dealt with Canada in matters purely domestic, which had relation only to Canada and ourselves, we dealt with friendly States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. In just a moment. I summon Senators to ask within themselves, Why this particular treaty? When this treaty was under consideration in the State Department, not one word was said; we could not get any confidence, we could not obtain any information. Pardon me for a personal allusion. My colleague and I went to the State Department in behalf of our constituency to ask if it were true that a treaty of this kind was pending, when we were met by the very brave denunciation that no such thing was thought of, and after a while there came forth suddenly a document completed, and it certifies that there were present the Secretary of State, the Honorable Henry Stimson; the Minister of Canada, the Honorable Mr. Herridge; and a Mr. Allen, who sits in what they call his "private capacity."

If "private capacity" were to be considered by our State Department, why not let the great State of New York, or some of these greatly affected States, have their private capacity brought in? Why not have given some of the Senators who represented these sovereign States some chance to know something about this treaty? Why this secret procedure? And when it comes to the point of finding, sir, that a body of men who call themselves interstate associations of some nature are paying this gentleman, Mr. Allen, to be the advocate of the adoption of this treaty, was it because he was Mr. Allen, of Kansas, by which it is recited "Mr. Allen, of Kansas"? They knew that was not the truth when that recital went to the President. It was because he was known as an ex-Senator; and by virtue of being an ex-Senator, appointed for a short time by the Governor of Kansas to hold the place after the election of Senator Curtis to the vice-presidency, it was assumed that he, Senator Allen, could take the floor as in conversation to each Senator of this honorable body and advise the Senators who are representatives of the great States of the Union; and he is recited in the treaty, who in "private capacity" is sitting at the signing between the Imperial Government of Great Britain and the Government of the United States of America.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator if it is not agreeable to him.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator desires to interrupt me, it may be well to do so now, as I might have in mind some other expressions concerning this Mr. Allen, and perhaps it is well that I do not utter them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator apparently makes a point of the fact that this treaty is written in the name of the British Empire, or the King, or the Emperor. Do I understand the Senator to indicate by that assertion that it would be possible for Canada to make a treaty with us in her own name?

Mr. LEWIS. No; but I call the attention of my eminent friend to the fact that if the question were merely one of cutting some land, or of having a mere waterway route, or a matter of freight rates and water power, that would have been done by a mere contractual arrangement between two states, one called the United States, if you please, and the other the state of Canada; or, if it were a question solely of water power, by the State of New York and Canada. It was not at all essential that there should be an imperial treaty signed by the Imperial Government of Great Britain if these two little insignificant matters, compared to what was the real object, had been the only purpose of the treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Can the Senator suggest to me any such international contract that was ever written except in treaty form?

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest to the Senator that if a contract is an international contract between nations for international purposes, of course, it would be made in treaty form; but where is there any such question here? In the little purpose which, it is said, is merely for the reduction of some freight rates on a water route as between the countries, or merely for the development of water power, where is there any question calling for any international treaty between governments?

Mr. VANDENBERG. This appears to be a very small and insignificant matter now; but about an hour and a half ago the Senator from Illinois said it was a matter of tremendous importance.

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, the Senator is wrong. I am quoting the Senator. The Senator was pointing out how small these little things were compared to our objection; what an infinite wrong to our great Government was involved, and that the opposition of the railroads and those who opposed the carrying out of this project because of reduction of freight rates, and so forth, was with respect to small matters compared to the great advantages which would be derived from carrying out the project.

Mr. VANDENBERG. At least the Senator from Illinois and I agree, as I understand, that there could not be a treaty between the United States and Canada except as it was written precisely in the pro forma dress of this treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. No; I do not agree to that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator contend that a treaty could be made between the United States and Canada alone?

Mr. LEWIS. If it were a treaty, it would be an international treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. But in a matter of this kind it is a compact, and not a treaty. As I have said to the Senator—and I ask him to look into it from a historical basis—in the dealings with this subject for 11 years it was always proposed as an arrangement. The suggestion of an imperial treaty did not arise until 2 years ago.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator, of course, is familiar with the fact that we have six or seven treaties with Canada written in precisely the same language?

Mr. LEWIS. I must deny that. My able friend the eminent Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] suggested that, but I must deny it. In the case of the treaties which we have with Canada, in one instance the treaty has the purpose of preventing us from having any defenses along the border of Canada. We can build no forts. Britain provided for herself, quite correctly—she had a right to do so—that we should have no right to protect ourselves as against Britain moving into Canadian waters, and then out of Canada, and assailing us. That was a treaty between the two imperial powers. The other treaty with Canada was respecting some division of territory.

The other matters which were referred to this morning by my able friend the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and my brother Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], alluded to some other water relation, and upon examination it will be discovered that those arrangements were by means of compacts between the Executives of the two Governments.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then the Senator's objection is that this is made in the form of a treaty instead of in the form of a compact?

Mr. LEWIS. No. I regret that I have not been able to elucidate my view sufficiently for my friend, the able Senator from Michigan, to gather it. That is not my point, sir; but that the motive behind this instrument, by which it is given the imperial power, as a treaty by the imperial power of Britain and the United States, is in order that it shall be enforced when the time comes to the complete purpose, which was to gather the waterway into the United States whenever they can; and whenever the necessity arises in conflict—should we be the ally of any land, or should our interest be in common with that of some other land that is in conflict with Britain—Britain then would have the privilege of entering into this waterway within territory that was in the United States, and there oppose our movements in any way that was necessary to her protection. My thought is not that she wants war with us, but that in the event that some course of ours should happen to be taken in behalf of any nation or as against any nation in a manner that was adverse to her interest, she would be in a position entirely and completely to block and obstruct everything in the central vale of our territory.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I mistook the Senator's statement, then.

Mr. LEWIS. That was what I felt was the real reason for the treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I mistook the Senator's meaning, then, when I understood him to say that there was something devious and ominous in the fact that a treaty between Canada and the United States was proclaimed in the name of the mother country.

Mr. LEWIS. On this subject matter, which was a matter that was subject to arrangement by a mere compact.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There could not be a treaty on any other basis; could there?

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the able Senator from Michigan that I deny that a treaty in this form was at all essential if it be true that the water and the water power and the freight rates were necessary to be dealt with.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is another question.

Mr. LEWIS. No; that is the question. That is the trouble.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I ask the Senator from Illinois if we cannot agree on the basic proposition that there could not be a treaty between the United States and Canada except in this form?

Mr. LEWIS. We can agree that if the subject matter were of a kind that should rise to the dignity and power of an international treaty, it could be done only by the Empire of Britain. Then the United States would be awakened to the object.

I call to the attention of the Senator from Michigan, and ask him to reply, if he has something to reply on behalf of Michigan, why is it that during all of these negotiations the Empire of Great Britain was never alluded to or referred to? It was Canada only with which we were supposed to be dealing as the neighbor across the line. Why only after the World War do we find that it is urged upon us in this manner, with this haste and madness, under the specious guise of coming to our rescue and giving us the blessing of a decreased freight rate to overcome Canada, and a water power that shall displace Canada in her manufactories? This, we are told, is the reason that Great Britain enters into this imperial treaty.

I ask Senators to pause and consider: In what instance has there been a treaty by Great Britain for a waterway that was not put upon the basis of commercial need; and where has there been a treaty or an arrangement by Britain for a waterway which afterward was used in the necessities of war, which waterway was not secured in the first place under the guise of an economic mutual benefit? I will ask my able friend from Michigan to answer me that. He is an eminent historian. He has written a volume that I have been pleased to praise, touching the relationships; and I ask him the question: Can he give me an instance of a single treaty made by Great Britain with any country for the mutual enjoyment of a waterway that was not put upon the ground of a commercial benefit, and which was not afterward used for war purposes? And what one used for war purposes was not first obtained under the pretense of commercial necessity?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to pursue the historical precedents to which the Senator alludes; but in the present instance, with 3,000 miles of unprotected frontier between Canada and the United States from coast to coast, without a fort or a gun upon it, I submit to the Senator that any imagination which can contemplate a war between Canada and the United States, or a use of this boundary in anything but a neighborly fashion, can contemplate the veritable end of civilization.

Mr. LEWIS. Then I answer that in 1916 the Senator could have said that to conceive the United States in a European war was far beyond the capacity of imagination; and yet he saw it, and he saw us drawn into it by the propaganda and influences of some of the very governments that are now interested in this treaty.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I submit to the Senator that his analogy is utterly without justification——

Mr. LEWIS. That is a mere matter of the standards of the Senator from Michigan and myself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I submit that the Senator's analogy is utterly without justification, because, if the Senator will permit me to say so, the conflict to which he adverts was between countries that were armed and prepared against each other; and I am drawing a parallel, as the Senator well knows, respecting a 3,000-mile boundary line without a single bit of ammunition on it, and I am discussing a situation in which for 100 years neighbors have lived without any armies against each other, and I know the Senator anticipates they will continue so to do.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say if conditions could remain as they have ever been, well might the able Senator from Michigan assume that they would produce the same result; but, with Russia and Japan in the situation in which we now see them and with the world as we now behold it, if conflict should arise in connection with which Canada as an adjunct, and a necessary adjunct, of the great Empire of Great Britain, should be called upon to act, act she must. Then would arise the question whether Canada would allow the Empire of Great Britain and her instrumentalities to come through this channel as they would have a right, and, bending down, curve into the United States within the very heart of the Mississippi Valley and also into the State of New York.

Since the Senator seems to attach importance to it, upon the theory that this treaty is to be with Great Britain, I ask then, Where is there any right on the part of the United States of America or the Government of the Empire of Great Britain to contract the territorial area of the State of Illinois, where lies Lake Michigan, and the territory of New York, where lies her land, without the consent of those States? I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has disposed of this question, and that is why I again urge there is no legal treaty here, nor can it be in this honorable body adopted. I read from the case of Geofry against Riggs, One Hundred Thirty-third United States, the opinion by Mr. Justice Field, touching this question.

> That the treaty power of the United States extends to all proper subjects of negotiations between our Government and the governments of other nations is clear. It is also clear that the protection which should be afforded to the citizens of one country owning property in another, and the manner in which that property may be transferred, devised, or inherited—

As I remarked a moment ago to my eminent friend from Michigan, as says the Court—> are fitting subjects for such negotiation and of regulation by mutual stipulations between the two countries.

This is what I contended to the Senator from Michigan was the form for compact for mere water rights or power privileges from water—"mutual stipulations."

That we have done with Canada frequently, and I wish it were attempted in this matter. Then says the Court:

> The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent.

And yet the eminent negotiators have not hesitated in giving a foreign nation a privilege upon Lake Michigan, in my State, within the United States, and a portion of the territory of the State of New York without the consent of those States, for it does not appear in this treaty that either of them has ever consented. The Supreme Court of the United States, quoting the opinion in the case of Fort

Leavenworth Railroad v. Lowe (114 U.S.), calls attention to the fact that, without the signature of the State, where the sovereign right of the State is affected, an instrument cannot be treated as a treaty which attempts completely to surrender the privilege and rights of the sovereign entity.

Mr. President, I have gone very far, I confess, in discussing the subject. I stated at the outset that the subject will be discussed, of course, from time to time as to its different phases. I have touched upon the question of freight rates and upon the question of water power. I now, Mr. President, want to conclude this particular branch of the discussion, as I know I should, although there may be other phases of the treaty that I may wish to resume later, and I shall certainly do so in reply to some of the arguments which my eminent friends in behalf of the treaty may present; but, Senators, if I am correct that the object of this treaty is something much beyond a mere recital of water power and freight rates, it behooves us to ask the question, Why should the United States enter again into partnership with a foreign country with nothing at stake in the world except such considerations as are small in money compared to what in conflict of nations may grow out of it?

Mr. President, in domestic matters, as we are informed, one can never have a divorce until there has been a marriage. Have we not learned anything from the World War? Did we not go far enough with international obligations which resulted in the death of thousands and thousands of our sons, entailing a burden of millions and hundreds of millions of expense upon our Treasury? From the tears and wrenched hearts of women, from the sacrifice of the blood and the brain and life of American mankind, and with just now, sir, the terrible aspect of the future surrounding us with such a cloud, have we learned nothing? Are we to repeat the disaster and enter again into a partnership with a great empire that has been in conflict with every country in the world at some time or other in the protection of what she felt to be her right? She will have a right to protect herself against the advance to which Sir Esme Howard alludes in the article on the advent of Russia, which he says is mysterious and which they do not understand. Should Russia take the same course in her attitude against Japan or Japan in her attitude against Russia as in the past and the rights of the United States should be involved, instead of standing as an independent nation, England, in behalf of her treaty with Japan, will have the right to come to the edge of our land and then down to the Great Lakes with her cruisers ostensibly filled with freight but also filled with all the possibilities of explosives and that which could decimate thousands on the pretext of an obstruction to either the activities of an opposing land, on the one hand, or carrying out an arrangement of a defense rapprochement, sir, with any other country for her own protection. And are we to sit silently and, under the guise of that which appears insignificant by comparison, refuse to recognize the danger that is just ahead or the possibilities of the future as we see it, both from the Orient as well as from Europe?

Senators, it is because of my anxiety in view of the danger, as I see it, that lurks in this arrangement called a treaty that I summon you to give consideration, that you may realize that as we now are situate we are safe, we are secure, we are at peace with the world, we are the one great Nation that owes no money to any foreign land in the world to vex us with military demand as collector; we stand with an unimpeached credit before the earth; we are the Nation, sir, that just now is free from the prospects of a conflict from any just and honorable government; but we now invite ourselves into the one thing that has produced the only conflict the Nation has ever had with any foreign nations—the misconstruction of arrangements of pacts and treaties. In this hour of preservation and security, shall we give up our superiority? Shall we yield our splendid station of peace and power that in supremacy is the admiration of the world? Sir, I summon you to return to the teachings of our fathers and cling at this hour close to them in obedience and pray fidelity to the guidance of the directors of our destiny—our fathers of government and our Father in Heaven.

From this security we may know that as the sentry of passing days, pacing his rounds upon the watch tower of civilization, conning the ominous signs of the times, shall hear rung out the challenge, "Watchman, what of the night?" Heaven grant that, true to the lessons of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, of friendship with all nations and alliances with none, he may respond, "Thank God, all is well."

Wednesday, January 17, 1934

(Continuation from Monday, Jan. 15, 1934)

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to make some reference to the views expressed, as I gathered them from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of today, uttered by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], touching what is called the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. I regret that I was out of the Chamber when the able Senator yesterday submitted some views touching the construction of the treaty as it relates to the relationship of Great Britain and the United States in reply to my position as expressed by me in Monday's speech. The Senator had told me that he desired to advert to a feature under the treaty, and he intimated what his construction was. I told him that as I remembered the record there were features in the record, if accepted by word, that I could not contest that seemed to sustain his view, and that I must concede. I was called to one of the departments at that moment and left the Senate.

Now, sir, what I wish to impress upon the Senate is that while one may concede that a certain portion of the record may sustain certain claims, and while apparently the record sustains the construction of some one or two or three contestants, or of many, yet it does not establish the conclusion as contended by either merely because something of the record may appear to support the view. I refer to the view expressed in the testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee as to the treaty.

I now advert to that portion wherein I have stated that among other fears I had than those which I expressed were the possible uses of this waterway and the possibility of use of it by Great Britain or its agents or its allies in the event of conflict that might necessitate Great Britain to enter into the conflict or obstruct the United States in some form, for the protection of her interests.

The able Senator from Michigan—quite the ablest and most competent advocate of certain features of the treaty and that touching the international phase, I readily concede, in behalf of those speaking in support of the treaty—has his viewpoint strongly impressed either from personal conviction or from what he feels is a just deduction from what we call the record. I am equally impressed to the contrary, drawing my impression from my understanding of the subject from investigation or from the impression that one gathers in deliberating upon a subject of such grave importance as this is in its relationship to his country.

Somewhere in the Holy Scripture we have the observation of the heathen being wedded to his idol. As there is nothing to make the comparison of heathen applicable, there is a great deal to make applicable the expression of being wedded to an idol. I have intimated that there can arise very serious difficulties which will be born of our adopting this canal project and having it built within the United States by Great Britain as a part of the property of Great Britain, if we allowed it. Particularly so in the event of conflict arising as that now threatened from the East and, as I read, as prophesied by the former Ambassador of Great Britain who served here in the United States, Sir Esme Howard.

I have made no allusions to these frequent quotations from statesmen and officers of the navy of Japan, nor have I alluded in any respect to the viewpoint of fear expressed by those who really feel that there must ultimately be a conflict between this land of the Western World and that of the Orient which we speak of as Asia. To that I have refrained from making allusion, hoping that such may never transpire and conscious that many fears expressed may really be the birth of dreams of terror possessing the minds of very eminent citizens of both lands, the United States and the Orient, but which are the figment of saddened impress drawn from the influence and effect of the late World War. But at this moment I cannot overlook how many there are in my country, sir, who indulge the fear to such an extent that they feel their own land is remiss in her own defense if she does not at once gather herself together looking to such increase of Army and Navy and such other instrumentalities of defense as would be both becoming and called for by these expressed fears.

I now reply to my eminent friend with specificness. It is true the assertions I have made in deference to these fears and my personally impressed reason, among others, why we should not risk entering in this canal treaty for the very small assumed advantages that are promised, measured by the great possible danger that could arise from the endurances that could be suffered from it.

I invite attention to the record under Senate Resolution 278, reading first from page 34 of the hearings. I invite attention first to that which is printed in the record of the statement of Representative Teneyck, of New York, in which he quotes certain expressions, saying, first, as opposition to the construction by the United States of the Canadian canal, as described in the treaty now before us:

> In the event of war between Great Britain and any other country on friendly terms with the United States, or any war between this country and an ally of Great Britain, this country could not send food products or any other shipment through the St. Lawrence waterway.

This viewpoint, as you see, sir, is expressed by this eminent former Member of Congress from the State of New York. I ask the attention of the Senate, in fortification of expressions I have given to the Senate, to a very able source from New England. I ask attention specifically to a speech made by former United States Senator Lodge, eminent leader of a great political party, a distinguished statesman, and now written in history as one of the very great statesmen of America. I refer to a speech appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 18, 1919, at page 3676. I read from the RECORD what Senator Lodge said.

Referring to this proposed St. Lawrence Treaty in its prospect, referring to the then expressed wish of those who advocated it, said Senator Lodge—then, sir, it will be remembered, in 1919—he occupying the highest place upon the Comittee on Foreign Relations, and being necessarily in touch with the great questions which at that time, virtually during the World War, had attracted the attention of such statesmen as himself. He is looking to the defense and protection of America—said Senator Lodge:

> We ought to think long before we join with another country * * * to make a waterway which we cannot control. The people who control the mouth of the river control the river. * * * If any waterway can be found through our own country, I think the ship canal should be made in that way * * * which will give cheapness of transport to the products of the agricultural West, and yet at the same time keep it within our boundaries. * * * As long as the waterway is in our own territory there is no danger of any international discussion. * * * One way of making them (our good relations with Canada) as close as possible is to avoid subjects of dispute.

Mr. President, may I make bold, sir, to say that much I had myself to say on this subject a few days past was wholly well expressed within this very observation of the late distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, with whom I had many differences while serving as Senator under the Wilson administration on very general subjects. I cannot be said to be a partial advocate of the Senator, yet on the subject before us he concludes by saying that in which I wish to join and which I think I am not very far apart from truth when I say verifies the fears I expressed and the hopes I trusted might be realized. He continues in this speech on the canal-treaty subject:

> One way of making them (our good relations with Canada) as close as possible is to avoid subjects of dispute. * * * We are taking some risk when we put the control of a large portion of our most important commerce in the hands of another country.

Mr. President, therefore I call to the attention of my learned friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] the views of these eminent sources. Now, sir, in support of the attitude I have expressed, that Canada herself realized that she now had complete advantage of America under this treaty and was now removing every obstruction which previously stood in the way of her complete possession and the complete domination by Great Britain of this area, I now ask that I be permitted, and here I take the liberty, to read extracts from the Toronto Mail and Empire, wherein it expresses the views of Canada insofar as it speaks for the Government; and it is, let it be recalled, the organ of the administration in power at the time of the making of this treaty.

I wish here to announce that I shall place the whole editorial in the RECORD. I shall read but extracts.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, keep in view, sir, that this editorial was written while we were considering this treaty, and while it was before the body; and before the House of Canada, its Parliament, has ratified it—a very questionable thing, we might say, as to this very great paper. We might ask who stimulated it or who inspired the paper to publish this particular editorial while the matter was before the court. Was it with the object of influencing the one court or the other, called the tribunal of approval, or both courts, Canadian Parliament or United States Senate?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will it interfere with the Senator's line of argument for me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. LEWIS. If the able Senator from Missouri desires to interrupt me, I yield, of course.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Illinois undoubtedly is familiar with the fact that there has existed in behalf of this project, over a period of several years, a lobby which has admittedly spent a sum in excess of half a million dollars. When the Senator inquires as to the source of information or the source of propaganda, it seems to me it might be well to refer to that fact.

Mr. LEWIS. I may say, in answer to the Senator from Missouri, that I made some allusions to that character of association.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will not interrupt the Senator from Illinois by asking the Senator from Missouri any questions at this time; but I give notice that I shall question him further, later on, about the $500,000 lobby, because to me it is totally unknown.

Mr. CLARK. May I interrupt the Senator from Illinois a little bit further?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the eminent Senator for a colloquy upon this subject; not, of course, yielding the floor.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I had seen the evidences of this lobby several years before I ever came into the Senate of the United States. I made the suggestion to a reporter for the Chicago Tribune several days ago, when he questioned me with reference to a statement I had made with regard to this lobby in a speech at St. Louis in the month of December. Later on, the Chicago Tribune published a direct quotation from Mr. Craig, the director of this lobby, in which he specifically admitted expenditures of more than $500,000.

I should like to say to the Senator that I do not charge, and never have charged, any corrupt use of this money, but the money undoubtedly has been used for propaganda purposes over the United States for the past several years.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, all I have to say is that I think we should be quite careful here in speaking of a lobby of $500,000 unless it is in the form of authoritative testimony before some committee where a man might be under oath, and might be subject to inquiry as to his methods.

For instance, it has been charged in the press and in various places, but I have not called attention to it because I have no evidence on it, that the railroad companies have expended vast sums of money in fighting the power proposition of New York and also the St. Lawrence waterway; that the Power Trust has spent large sums of money in fighting not only this waterway but every waterway, including, we will say, the Boulder Dam waterway, and others that create cheap hydroelectric power under the control of the Government. I do not think, however, that any of us have authoritative evidence that we could present to this body so as to influence in any way whatever the determination of any Senator in this body.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will yield just a moment further for me to make a very brief answer to the Senator from Nevada—

Mr. LEWIS. I yield further.

Mr. CLARK. I shall be very glad, indeed, in my individual capacity as a Member of this body, to join with the Senator from Nevada in having a Senate investigation of the propaganda agencies which have been maintained and financed from various sources, either in support of or in opposition to the St. Lawrence Treaty.

So far as I am concerned, I have never made the suggestion, and I do not now make the suggestion, that any improper means have been employed by the St. Lawrence lobby in influencing United States Senators or influencing public opinion. That such a lobby has existed is not questioned, either before any Senate committee or by the promoters of the lobby itself. Mr. Craig has made a statement which has been reported in a great national newspaper; and when the Senator from Nevada makes the suggestion that I am saying something which could not be supported before a Senate committee, I reply that the authority for the statement comes from the promoter of the lobby himself.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the chairman of the committee for this colloquy, with the understanding that I am not yielding the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. It undoubtedly has come to the attention of the Senator from Missouri, although it was before he became an honored Member of this body, that there was a very thorough investigation through the Federal Trade Commission of the so-called "power lobby" of this country. The evidence of that is in the form of records of this body which can be obtained. I have not called attention to that in the debate. It is well enough to investigate those things so as to determine the motives of publications, and so forth; but I have always felt and now feel that all of these articles, no matter on which side they may be written, in view of the fact that the Senators have access to authoritative testimony, do not have any influence on any Senators in this body.

Mr. CLARK. I will agree with the statement of the Senator from Nevada on that subject.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think the intimation occasionally made by Senators that possibly some form of propaganda will influence some Senators is a mistake, because I do not believe it influences any of us.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Illinois will yield further——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri at this moment.

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator from Nevada that his inference that I had made a statement or that I had any impression that the St. Lawrence lobby, which undoubtedly exists, had influenced the mind or the vote of any Member of this body is entirely mistaken. My original remark, which provoked the reply of the Senator from Nevada, had to do only with the statement of the Senator from Illinois as to the origin of certain matter which has been printed in the newspapers in Canada and in the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Maryland for a continuation of the colloquy on the present issue before the Senate, I not yielding the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. Has the Senator any information which would show the probable amount of tonnage which would be carried by the new waterway?

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Maryland address his question to me or to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TYDINGS. I address it to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say that the question came up in a colloquy between the able chairman of this committee and myself while I was debating the question; and the chairman read from the record some testimony upon the question, which I am sure he will indicate to the Senator from Maryland, which gives some more exact figures than my memory might direct him to.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I had in mind was this, if the Senator will permit another interruption?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes.

Mr. TYDINGS. A great many of the railroad companies are heavy borrowers from the Government, because their revenues were insufficient to sustain the bond issues and defray the other maintenance expenses of the roads. Indeed, some of the railroads which have borrowed from the Government have since gone into the hands of a receiver. It occurred to me that it would be very pertinent—perhaps the Senator has already put it in the RECORD, but, if he has not, it would be very pertinent—to show what further shrinkage there would be in the revenues of the transportation companies by virtue of tonnage being carried over the waterway which is under discussion.

Certainly, if the Government is going to build this waterway it should not lend any more money to railroads which are already in such a precarious condition that it is doubtful whether the loans are going to be repaid; because I think it is perfectly obvious that if we make loans, on the one hand, to the railroads in order to enable them to survive, and build something to take the revenues away, on the other hand, we are simply kissing good-bye to many millions of dollars through such a policy. While I do not mean to say that the building of this waterway may not be a benefit to the shippers of the West, at the same time there is the other side of the picture, as to what it will cost those who are now employed in the East in the loss of employment and in the loss of revenue to the bondholders and holders of other instrumentalities of the railroads who receive sustenance from their revenue.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator from Maryland for his suggestion. I now yield to the chairman of the committee, who desires to respond directly, I assume, to the query of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will not interrupt the Senator's speech at this time, but will state to the Senator from Maryland that in the documents accompanying the message of the President a statement of the facts to which he has alluded is given, as estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Shipping Board. I do not think there is much dispute about the figures, and the figures are now being compiled for the benefit of the Senate. The probable amount of tonnage that would be diverted from the railroads east of Chicago is being estimated as near as may be, as well as the amount of freight which will move through the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes waterway to the Atlantic ports, the Gulf ports, and the Pacific ports, and will be distributed from those ports to the interior. The figures are being estimated now.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for another suggestion with his usual tolerance of interruptions?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for a colloquy, not yielding the floor.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not want to take a provincial view about this matter; I think it is a big national matter. At the same time, I am human enough, representing a seaboard

State, not to want to see any industry or any business carried on within its borders injured, unless there is overwhelming reason why it should stand that injury. It therefore occurs to me that, in the consideration of this treaty, we should not be carried away entirely by the benefit that will come to the shippers of the West, if we are to have an economic duplication of our transportation system, which would be nothing more nor less than economic waste at one and the same time.

I do not mean to suggest that the figures may not sustain the justice of the treaty. What I did want to point out to the Senate, however, was that labor on the railroads will be affected, investments in the railroads will be affected, and sea services now running out of our Atlantic ports will be affected, and many other incidental activities will be affected, by the carriage over the St. Lawrence waterway of traffic which is now being carried by the transportation companies; and with the precarious condition of the transportation companies, I think we ought to consider very, very carefully the Government's stake in that situation before we act too hastily upon it.

Mr. PITTMAN rose.

Mr. LEWIS. The chairman of the committee desires to respond to the Senator from Maryland, and I yield for that purpose, without yielding the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to say that, far from affecting adversely the western roads, if the construction of this waterway should result in cheaper freight rates, it would stimulate those roads in bringing products to the sea or to the Lakes.

As far as eastern roads are concerned, from the point of distribution at Chicago, we will say, or Missouri River points, there will be some portion of five to six million tons that would probably be diverted from the distributing railroads to the seaports of New York, Baltimore, and like ports. The compensatory freight which they would obtain, I must say, has not been worked out, but the figures as to that are being worked out, because I have requested them for the very reason suggested by the Senator from Maryland.

We do know that 80 percent of the freight carried by this waterway will be domestic, or coastwise; at least, that is the estimate. In other words, freight will move from the Great Lakes out the St. Lawrence to Baltimore Harbor for distribution in this country, and it will move in some cases to Baltimore and back around through the canal to harbors on the Great Lakes. The figures as to what that compensatory freight will be, I will say frankly to the Senator, unfortunately are not in my possession, and I do not find them accurately worked out in the hearings.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will permit one more interruption, I shall not transgress further on his time.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield, because the colloquy is interesting and informing, and that it should be connected is very natural. I yield because, as the Senator has said, we have before us a very grave international situation to be discussed.

Mr. TYDINGS. Everyone recognizes the fact that the railroads of the United States are in a very bad condition. Due to the growth of motor transportation, their freight revenues and their passenger revenues have fallen off materially. Some people do not like to say a word in favor of the railroads, because they fear they might be tied up with what might be called a "Railroad Trust." I am not afraid or ashamed to say a word for the railroad companies, because I can imagine no greater catastrophe that could happen to the country than to have these great railroad systems junked or scrapped or abandoned.

Of course, the facts may prove otherwise, but I am not so sure that this economic duplication to a very sick transportation system, which is the condition of the railroads today, may not be a death blow to some systems which might have survived had the waterway not been built, but which cannot survive if the waterway is built.

As I said, I do not want to be provincial and think only of Baltimore and Maryland and the neighborhood influences of the building of this canal in drawing my own conclusions. I think it takes on a national aspect, and even though the roads in the West may prosper, forsooth, what good will the roads in the West be if the roads in the East suffer so that their services are crippled, because a great deal of the western traffic, in the last analysis, must rely on eastern transportation to reach other points than those which the shipping down the St. Lawrence would carry. Therefore I say again that, the railroad conditions being so serious, I am delighted that the Senator from Nevada, the chairman of the committee, is obtaining the information upon which an accurate conclusion can be drawn as to the effect of this waterway. In the absence of that information, it is my opinion, without knowing the facts, as I have said, that any advantage which will be gained to the shippers of the West by virtue of this waterway will be paid for tenfold by a curtailed efficiency on the part of the railroads of this country, to say nothing about the loss of revenue to labor and capital, which have already made large investments therein.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PITTMAN. The only answer I have to the Senator from Maryland is to say that from an examination I have made in the matter and which I am trying to confirm, I am of exactly the opposite opinion from that of the Senator from Maryland. I think the increased shipments of freight moving away from the factories, and so forth, for distribution through the ports along the Atlantic coast, the Gulf coast, and the Pacific coast, will more than offset the loss from the diversion in the eastern portion of the St. Lawrence. That is just my opinion.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I did not enter into a discussion of the matter of these roads and their relations at this time. I answer in response to my able friend from Maryland for the reason that, in the previous general discussion which I entered here as against the treaty, I alluded to features of that, and frankly stated that the interests of Senators were more or less controlled by the interests of the constituencies they represented. I confessed then, as I now reaffirm and repeat, my own relation is not wholly free from the influence of that interest, for my very great State, represented by my distinguished colleague, Senator DIETERICH, and myself, finds itself peculiarly involved in every phase which this treaty represents and, as it contends, greatly to its injury in every phase of its interest, in the event this treaty is ratified.

On these questions of costs there remain, as the Senator from Nevada has just this second called attention to, those relative oppositions in this discussion, in view of the extended geography of our country, and the naturally conflicting interests of our States, bearing such geographical relation to each other, both in their position, as we might say, on the map, and their relations in regard to the products they produce, but that interest will ever be expressed and will ever dominate.

I am sure the scholars about me inclined to literature will recall in Browning's The Book and the Ring the great lawsuit wherein we find the great actor in the scene before the court being queried:

"What are you here for?"

"For my interest."

"What interest?"

"That which I possess."

"You come here to fight for your possession?"

"Yes. It is all that mankind ever fights for, whatever name he may give it, or whatever color he may ascribe to it; and it is for that that I am here."

To which the inquiry proceeds:

"It was understood you came here to fight for justice. We are here to execute the law."

"Yes, my lord; but as for me, in behalf of the interests of my right, I stand for that justice which is justice above the law."

So stand we all of us in relations of this kind; we stand for our sense of justice above the law of treaty or compact. So stand we as to the mere letter—but above all, sirs, touching its spirit, we protect and preserve what we feel is our interest involved, and I am bold to flatter myself that this honorable body will believe that I am speaking apart from the interest of my great State, for which my colleague [Mr. DIETERICH] and myself speak, and which we represent—when I speak for the interest of my country at large as I behold it, now by this proposed treaty endangered.

The interruption found me on the eve of reading extracts from the editorial, and in response to the Senator from Michigan as to the construction of the treaty in its relation to Canada, and of Great Britain, of bringing forth the expression that I felt justified my charge that Canada was conscious in this treaty she had overcome the United States through the influence of the empire of Great Britain, and that to the complete destruction of all the claim which the United States had in connection with what she might have felt her right or her benefit under the treaty.

Therefore I proceed to read the extracts from the editorial, the whole of which I am putting in the RECORD. Says the editorial—the paper representing, as I again advert, the administration of Canada in power, and what we would speak of in this country as the public voice—speaking of the treaty:

It is more favorable than anyone outside a limited Government circle could have hoped for.

Not only this!—

Says the editorial, with, indeed, what we know must be the approval of the Government in power in Canada, and we know that the editorial had passed under the eyes of the officials of the Government in Canada before the editorial was placed in the organ of the Canadian Government's expression—the United States abandons its ancient contention that Lake Michigan is an "American lake." That great body of water has become forever, through this new treaty, an international body of water.

Not only this!—

Says the editorial—

And I invite the attention of my esteemed friend and the distinguished Senator who so honors the State of Michigan, Brother VANDENBERG, that as late as July 1932, and later reaffirmed just now, as we have had occasion to observe, in the month of December, just a month past, the organ of the administration of Canada alludes to the fact that Lake Michigan has become an international body of water through this new treaty, confessing that—despite the contention of my honorable friend—the construction of Canada as one that had never been that under the other treaties alluded to by my able friend from Michigan in his address of yesterday, as I read it in the RECORD—not having had the honor and pleasure of having heard it—this body of water, the lake, was an international body of water. Yet now it contends, and for its administration asserts, that it is an international body of water under the new treaty; and for the first time it is its contention that it, the lake, has become, as they insist, an international body of water, this Lake Michigan of the State of Illinois and its sisters nearby, within, and wholly within, the United States of America.

The editorial proceeds:

No feature of the treaty is more surprising or more satisfactory than the low cost to Canada at which the undertaking is to be carried out. Because of want of information, the press has carried all sorts of extravagant statements as to the heavy financial burden with which the taxpayers were to be saddled in a time of depression.

This alludes to their newspapers in Canada, sir. The editorial continues:

Most of the construction work will be done in Canada. All the construction on the national section will, of course, be done here, but there is more than that.

* * * * * * *

Those who have been nervous about Canadian sovereignty should read article 5 of the treaty, which provides that each of the high contracting parties shall retain complete ownership of, and complete legislative and administrative jurisdiction over, all works lying on its own side of the international boundary.

Giving notice to the United States that the great construction for which we paid in vast millions, which we drained from the pockets of our own people, are to be wholly owned by Canada and, in its effect and general production and usefulness, is to be wholly administered by Canada.

The editorial then proceeds:

This proviso is deliberately inserted to protect Canadian sovereignty over all structures lying on the Canadian side, even though these structures have been built with United States money.

Can we imagine a more glaring, open, frank statement of the delight and joy which these people have at having overcome our country, secured from our Treasury its possession, obtained its expenditure, and flaunt in our faces their rejoicing and their self-praise of how their statesmen have undone us?

Then says the concluding feature:

The Ottawa government—

Showing, as I said but a moment past, that this editorial was suggested by the government when it appeared in the government paper—

The Ottawa government regards this treaty as of great importance—

To Canada, Mr. President? And I call my able friend's attention to the distinction I made between the British Empire and Canada—

Regards this treaty as of great importance to Great Britain and the Empire.

Very little, sir, as to Canada, as I had pointed out previously from the very deduction and construction of that treaty, but I did not know that these clauses of comment had existed anywhere at the time I made the assertion drawn from the treaty through my own construction of the document—as it read—in its phrases.

Those honorable gentlemen, the Senator presiding at this time in the chair, and you who did me the compliment to hear me, recall that I drew that construction from the words of the treaty, but I did not know that Canada herself had somewhere influenced or inspired her official organ to proclaim to her own people that this treaty was of the greatest importance to Great Britain and the Empire for Empire purposes.

Then, proceeding, the editorial says:

It was, therefore—

What, therefore?—

Therefore—

Because of its importance to Great Britain—not in its commercial aspect to Canada, but because of its importance to the Empire—

It was, therefore, anxious—

"It"—who? The Empire. The Empire was—

Anxious to have it signed before the opening of the imperial conference.

What imperial conference? The conference in which my distinguished friend, the honorable chairman of this committee, my distinguished friend, the leader of my side of the House from Arkansas, in behalf of peace, took part. Canada was anxious to have this treaty signed in order that there at London the Empire could have the benefit of showing to the world in that conference the supremacy it had obtained over the United States in this treaty as the Empire of Great Britain.

Then the editorial says:

And it—

is to be congratulated upon having obtained its wish in this respect. It is stipulated in one of the articles of the treaty that all British shipping in all parts of the Empire—

In all parts of the Empire, Mr. President—not Canada, but all British shipping from any part of the Empire, from Australia to South Africa, and all Britain itself. It is provided in the treaty, as they now point out, what was the secret purpose, that it was the British shipping of the world they were solicitous to have entering this canal and, as I dared point out, sir, in my previous address, unload itself upon the ports of the United States of America and discharge itself at the doors of the commerce of the United States.

The editorial concludes on this phase:

It is stipulated in one of the articles of the treaty that all British shipping in all parts of the Empire shall have the right to navigation in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Waterway for all time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask my eminent friend from Michigan to please note those words, as I wish in a moment after I have yielded to my eminent friend from Minnesota to make an allusion to them in connection, particularly, with an observation made by the able Senator from Michigan yesterday, as I gather from the RECORD. I yield for a moment to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I believe the Senator is correct when he says that these ports would be open to all the shipping of the British Empire. I believe, further, that they will be open to the shipping of any other country in the world; but is it not also true that every port in the United States is open to every ship from whatever country it may come?

Mr. LEWIS. Has the Senator concluded his inquiry?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will proceed for a moment, if I may. If that is so, why differentiate the ports on the Great Lakes system? Why select them? It is true that the British ships are now allowed to come in and can come in through the Welland Canal. It is true that under the pending treaty, as under the treaty of 1909, British ships have the right to use the waters of Lake Michigan under the protection of our laws and subject to the laws of the United States, as our ships are subject to the laws of Canada when in Canadian waters.

I cannot find wherein the pending treaty—and I hope the Senator from Illinois will point out the place if it exists—changes the status of the waters of Lake Michigan from that which they now possess under the treaty of 1909, with two exceptions. The first is that under this treaty the right becomes permanent; it gives to foreign ships a permanent right, and the treaty is not subject to be denounced so far as the use of the waters of Lake Michigan is concerned; but it must be remembered that we have, under the treaties of 1871 and of 1909, the right in perpetuity to use the waters of the St. Lawrence River. Under this treaty we also have in perpetuity the right—if we did not have it before—to use the Welland Canal. On the other hand, in the treaty of 1909 no provision was made for the settlement of controversies growing out of the diversion of waters to another watershed at Chicago. Under the pending treaty such a provision is made, and a remedy is made available for the settlement of such controversies by arbitration. In case of emergency or of a controversy arising the right to protest against diversion from one watershed to another was protected to both countries in the treaty of 1909 and to recover damages, as it is, in identical language, protected in this treaty.

I repeat I cannot find in the pending treaty any justification for the statement made in the editorial referred to by the Senator from Illinois. If the Senator can find such justification, I should be very pleased to have him point it out. I have a great regard for the Senator's keenness of perception and understanding of treaties and of law, and I am sure the Senate will be delighted to have him indicate where there is any justification for saying that the waters of Lake Michigan are any more of an international body of water under the pending treaty than they are under the treaty of 1909.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the able Senator from Minnesota is within the category I have just described, as, indeed, am I, of those who represent the interests of constituencies who are particularly concerned and will greatly benefit in part from this undertaking. I heard the able Senator from Minnesota, who has just spoken, deliver upon this floor a very complete presentation in behalf of his State in support of this treaty. In that address he presented to the Senate, in most commendable array, the events of history that led up to the development of all the waterways surrounding the St. Lawrence, and which, in some form, bore some relation in the past or in the future to the development now proposed. In this respect he contributed information and history to this body. I now answer him specifically.

The Senator, first, as proof of the charge that I make of interest on the part of Minnesota, will recall that he represents a State wherein is located the city of Duluth, that princely community which was alluded to by Proctor Knott, of Kentucky, as "the zenith city of the unsalted seas." Duluth is the city in Minnesota where it is presumed this canal is to start, and at that point whatever financial benefit might be derived by that city and the State of Minnesota still could be to the wreckage of every one of the other 47 States of America. Here is one point alone where there is profit and benefit. But the able Senator overlooks the fact that his State also retains an interest in the waters of Lake Michigan to the point of objecting by lawsuit to Chicago, practically the mother and guardian of that lake, using its waters in sufficient quantity to protect her people against the ravages of disease. Minnesota, in very glaring audacity, had the courage and bravery to bring a lawsuit against the imperial and virtuous State of Illinois. This indicates the presumption that States sometimes have as against such superior advantages and surroundings about them as perfect Illinois possesses compared to her neighboring States.

Mr. President, apart from humor, let it be remembered that in that litigation great Minnesota and her neighboring States charged us with diverting water from the Lakes in such quantity as is alleged impaired their shipping at Duluth by reducing the level of the water there, lessening its volume, contending that the water would sink so low that it would not entertain ships of certain tonnage necessary, as was contended, for the advancement of trade and for the benefit, of course, of the port of Duluth. In this respect, if the charge as made is true, of course, there is much to be said in behalf of the contention of my eminent friend. I now meet his question to the point.

As to the ships of the world coming in, I invite his attention to the fact that this editorial—which, it may be said, is the inspired voice of the Government of Canada—does not say that the ships of the world shall come in; it says those of the British Empire. And I invite my friend to consider the suggestion that when they own this canal, when it is possessed, as they claim, by the British Empire that, as they say, will wholly have control, the British Empire, rest assured, is not to be so soft in its guardianship of its interests that it will not move to such regulation as against the ships of the world in competition with it as to continue its supremacy and masterhood of this canal which is referred to as of the British Empire.

Now, sir, as to the ships coming in, those that now come in come to the Atlantic ports. Some, as my eminent friend has said, may glide into intermediate channels, but why? By comity of the United States, by consent of the United States, subject at any hour on the part of the United States to be inhibited, to be prevented if cause arises for it, for there is no perpetual treaty between these lands that gives the owners of all foreign ships the privilege to possess our waters, as this treaty is intended to do in behalf of Great Britain, but until some infraction has been committed by them that calls for placing an embargo to their continuous passage to and fro; of course, they come in by comity of friendship in return for the privilege American ships are supposed to enjoy in the ports of their country. There is all the end of that.

But, sir, since my able friend says he cannot see where there is anything in this treaty to justify this editorial, I answer him that I agree with him in that I cannot believe, I will not believe, that any representative of my country in official station, belonging to any political party, deliberately, with knowledge, sold his country through the medium of a treaty to a rival, by which America should be bound down, cluttered around, treaty-spiked to the ground and placed in such a position of subordinate subservience to the demands of a foreign nation, as this editorial says is the case under the pending treaty.

Yet I do invite my able friend from Minnesota to consider this thought: This is the construction Canada gives to the treaty. This is the viewpoint they expect to urge, and in any moment of conflict this is the contention they are to urge in the name of the British Empire and, with their ships in the center waters along the great States of our Middle West, will be prepared to enforce it. It is that to which I call the attention of my eminent and able friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], who so distinguishes his State by his representation in this body; and I ask, What will arise in the hour of conflict? This editorial, being the voice of the government in power as to what it contends is meant by what it has obtained from this Government, as was its intention in obtaining it when it did so, says——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield in a moment. It says:

> The treaty has its power side as well as its navigation side. The work in the international section and in the national section will develop about 5,000,000 horsepower. Of this 2,000,000 horsepower will be available in the international section and 3,000,000 in the national section. * * * It is probably not going too far to predict that with this new canal and power development on the St. Lawrence River, with little cost to Canada, the Great Lakes region and St. Lawrence Valley will, in the next few years, be lifted into a place of industrial leadership.

Shall we, in the language of scriptural slang, say "Selah"? Yes; but it is we who with American money contributed by American taxpayers lift this rival of ours to this high point of eminence prophesied by this representative of the Canadian Government.

Then the editorial refers to Mr. Herridge, the Minister of Canada, to whom I likewise pay tribute as being an eminent gentleman, exemplary in manner, exquisite and attractive in personality, and says:

> To Mr. Herridge goes the main credit for the negotiation of the treaty. Ever since last October he has labored night and day to bring it about. He has made countless trips between Ottawa and Washington on this special mission, and, with the backing of the Premier, he has been able to secure an instrument which concedes to Canada practically all of Canada's demands. He has obtained a treaty which places the bulk of the cost on the United States and involves the Dominion Treasury in an expenditure of less than $40,000,000.

We will recall that with us the lowest estimate is $350,000,000. Well might they rejoice. Here, may it please you, sir, I present the estimates of the construction with the office, as I insist, of the Canadian Government, because this is what they feel it means in their behalf as expressed in the document that speaks their mission and their recollection. Likewise, it finds with specificness what they will contend against us in the hour of the very first conflict.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to interrupt me again?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If I may.

Mr. LEWIS. I am glad to yield again to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am glad to hear the eloquent Senator from Illinois state that he could not see in the treaty any justification for the editorial. I agree with the Senator. Being in agreement as we so often are—with credit for that to myself because I always listen and very often follow the wise counsel of the Senator from Illinois—having agreed upon the worth of the editorial so far as it reflects upon the treaty, can we not agree that the purpose of it is what is so often the purpose of any administration in power in any government in any country—to have written through their party organs flamboyant and bombastic editorials lauding the work of the administration in power in order that the people may know how much they look out for the interests of the people and to what extent they are able to outwit the statesmen of foreign countries?

I agree with the Senator from Illinois that I do not believe any American representative has sold his country. I do not believe there is any justification in the pending treaty for the editorial. I am glad the distinguished Senator from Illinois agrees with my view.

Mr. LEWIS. I must say to the able Senator that I do not agree that it is not justified. I agree that I could not see where the language would permit that form of construction against my own officials of my own country, but I insist that they in Canada behold in this treaty what they finally say is the accomplishment of all they ask, and they feel that what they asked is the very thing they say they have. It is their contention, as shown from this editorial, of what they feel is their victory in a complete possession from our country and its rights, and in the event of the slightest contention or dispute they will be found advocating this viewpoint.

I now answer my friend, whose address shows him to be an ardent historian, that this was the very situation in 1812, it was the situation in 1828, it was the situation with reference to the San Juan Treaty and the Treaty of Puget Sound, when we were dealing with the same friendly rival; but when the time came to claim possession, she claimed it and later to an extent that would have removed the State of Illinois into Canada under what they claimed to be the proper construction of the treaty. It is the construction they placed upon it which they fortified with guns, forts, and now with navy, and later with instrumentalities of a newly invented warfare, which we again call to the attention of the Senate is not to be ignored in this discussion.

My eminent friend from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] who has given the question great study and whose splendid speech some time past I trust will be presented to the RECORD freshly, because as I said I sat through that speech the whole day in which it was delivered, and I am not at all averse to saying it gave me a considerable sensation of disturbance. It was not without great difficulty, and the difficulty lies in overcoming the conclusions based on what I feel are wholly wrong premises; but if the premises are correct, the address of the able Senator will not be improved upon by any discussion that will be offered in behalf of the treaty. But I now ask him to note this fact.

The able Senator from Michigan yesterday had occasion to say, if I read correctly his views—I regret I was not present to have the delight of hearing them—that the present treaty gives no more as to Lake Michigan and its enjoyment by Great Britain than was previously enjoyed under previous treaties, and he names one treaty of 1909. I now invite the attention of the able Senator to that very slow, but sure process which Great Britain assumes under the management of her skillful directors in reaching the point where she could claim possession of this canal.

This particular Lake Michigan seems to have been particularly the purpose and object of Great Britain for a long period of time. With her long accustomed acquaintance with the effect of waterways and the advantages they have brought to her commerce and shipping and likewise in the ultimate contentions that arise between nations, she saw that this great body that sits near the boundary was essentially of great value if she could but cut through the edge of the boundary and place the water within her territory. She is seeking now to cut through the edges and obtain the waterway.

I bring to your attention, sir, that in the Webster-Ashburton Treaty, which was executed on August 9, 1842, there was an extension of only a portion and part of navigation to the Great Lakes and toward the St. Lawrence system. This treaty assumed to fix some boundary. There was some slight reference in the treaty to the St. Lawrence River, but, I invite my friend to remember, considerable reference to the Detroit River. I ask my able friend, who represents Michigan to the great glory of that State, if he will not recall that there was a debate on this clause, in another building when we were not in this building, between an eminent Senator from Michigan by the name of Cass with a Senator who then came from the great State of Arkansas by the name of Clayton, wherein the charge was made, Clayton having presented in behalf of others a clear intimation of the conduct of Michigan in surrendering a portion of the sovereignty of the United States to England through Canada.

It was then, the Senator may recall, that his ancient predecessor denied the fact and charged the treaty with having encroached upon Michigan and having in its advancement wronged the State by including clauses in it that had never been conceded by Michigan and had never been dreamed by that Territory at that time of being surrendered. But we observe that though that contention was made in behalf of the Territory of Michigan, nevertheless Great Britain through the skillful processes of her representatives, followed the same processes in the negotiations which preceded the treaty of 1871 which was called the "Washington Treaty" because the assemblage met here, and, after the order of an international assemblage, had a splendid dinner at which they were refreshed with most exhilarating wines, with the smiles of lovely women, basking in their presence, to the joy of those who were delegates, who felt themselves so greatly honored and elevated by the proceedings that on the following day, when ready for action, there was such a condition of surrender that it did not require very much exertion either physical or mental on the part of the representatives of Great Britain to secure their wishes. I rather envy the proceeding and regret I could not have been present as one of the delegates at the dinner. [Laughter.]

But it was in 1871 that Canada proceeded to agree that navigation of the St. Lawrence from the sea to the international boundary should forever remain free and open for the purpose of commerce to the citizens of the United States—but how? How in this treaty? Does it say "ever open", as my eminent friend, the Senator from Minnesota, a moment ago intimated? Never. It is open "subject to the laws and regulations of Great Britain"; and, as I said in a previous speech here, when this canal is opened, if it should be, there will be found these regulations coming forth that will give advantages to an honorable rival—Great Britain or one of her dominions, Canada—in such manner that we cannot hope to be its competitor upon equal terms, much less favorable ones, in moving our commerce through Canadian waters to the imperial community and landing at Liverpool.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Michigan desire to interrupt me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I suggest that the Senator continue the reading of his definition of the treaty of 1871; and I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this privilege of Great Britain to inject rules and regulations respecting the use of the mouth of the St. Lawrence River is subject to the restriction that these regulations must not be inconsistent with the privilege of free navigation, which entirely robs the Senator's challenge of any teeth whatever.

Mr. LEWIS. I deny the conclusion of the able Senator that it robs my observations of any teeth. I propose giving this lip service as well as teeth, and I call to the attention of my honorable friend that of which I have heretofore spoken.

The Senators on this floor now who did me the honor to hear my discussion the other day noted that the able advocate of this treaty from Michigan insisted that the Empire of Great Britain could only be considered as representing Canada, and, therefore, I must expect the treaty to be made in the name of Great Britain. I invite his attention, however, to the fact that under the treaty of 1871 the words particularly are "under the laws and regulations of Great Britain or of the Dominion of Canada", showing that at all times they regarded that there were two governments in this whole transaction—Canada for its local uses and Great Britain for its imperial purposes. Now, my friend says, "But it uses, does it not, the words 'not inconsistent with the privilege of free navigation'?" But who decides as to what is consistent or not? Britain. Whenever it is consistent with her welfare it is adopted. Whenever it is to our welfare and runs counter to hers it is inconsistent; or this commission, three and three, with an actual division that never can be decided in our favor, will then commit the matter to another body to meet at London after the order of those that resulted in treaties such as we recall brought on the conflict, sir, as to Venezuela between ourselves and England, very near to war, or that other as to the sealing privileges out in the Northwest, where she called us to London again in a famous gathering which finally resulted in a very unhappy result to the United States.

And while the artful words are inserted with great specification, with what might be called very elliptical mysteriousness, "not inconsistent", we are left in the exact condition where we then enter upon a new tribunal, dragging from year to year and from year to year, until the lives of all those engaged are passed away, before it is determined what is "inconsistent" within the meaning of those countries that are interested in one construction or the other.

Then, as I am anxious to come to the point of my able friend, I pass to the 1909 treaty from that of 1871; and in 1909, sir, we have article I of the treaty of 1909; and watch this slow proceeding:

In the Ashburton Treaty, Senator Cass, of Michigan, correctly contended that there was never any intention whatever of yielding any part of this water, and the Empire of Britain knew it. We come down, sir, to 1871, when the first contention is made for a small part of its enjoyment, and a contention in the manner I have pointed out, by which it is said that there are two governments involved, the Empire of Great Britain and the Dominion of Canada; and then, sir, as they creep on a little further, and the possession becomes the more rational from their point of view, and more secure, we get to 1909.

There we will see, sir, that an attempt is made to create what is called a boundary. The object of the treaty of 1909 is not what my able friend has assumed, that it is a treaty as to the privilege of navigation. Oh, no! It has a great deal of phraseology; it has a great many words; but the object of that treaty was to begin the slow course to the inevitable end of establishing Lake Michigan as a boundary water. All the rest around it, sir, is but embroidery upon the fabric; for once it could be established that it were a boundary water, then could come, of course, the negotiation in dealing with it as being upon the boundary under the old treaty, the beginning, the Webster-Ashburton Treaty. So, if my able friend will give the 1909 treaty a more close investigation, he will discover that it had for its real object the mere ascertainment, if possible, of terms that could be applied to Lake Michigan, such as to make it a boundary water, for the nearer you got it to a boundary water the nearer you would get it into an international stream, and as such you could then tie it, as it were, in the language of diplomacy, to the borders of Canada, and make it then become as one that it is said would have to yield as a border water under the international customs of treaties of a hundred years past.

We then turn to the 1909 treaty, for I want to speak of it; and I ask my able friend from Michigan if I do not quote a dialogue of his with Secretary Rogers, of the State Department. I think I can quote from memory. I assume to do so.

The 1909 treaty artfully—"artfully" is not the memory; it is the construction—proceeded to set forth an arrangement, but which was subject, sir, to being denounced. It proceeded to define some privileges to Lake Michigan in behalf of Canada. It proceeded to define in behalf of the United States some privilege of ours in waters we do not enter, and with which we rarely have anything to do; but it assumes to offer this for that in order to avoid the tit for tat. In the 1909 treaty it is provided, sir, that the treaty expires in a short period of time, not more than 2 years—just 1 year—but incidentally with it is also contained the privilege of denouncing the treaty and ending it by either country, which, of course, gave us the right to do so whenever it became advantageous to do so or necessary for our protection.

Mr. President, in the language of the famous lines of the colloquy, "here lies the germ of the disaster." Britain, with the same shrewdness and skill and sagacity that ever characterizes her diplomacy, saw that what was necessary was to remove the power of the United States to denounce the enjoyment of the treaty of 1909 in the event of conflict of thought or of expression.

If a conflict arose as to the construction, instead of biding our time to have tribunals established to determine what construction was right, we would immediately denounce the treaty and end it at once. In order to prevent that, the natural sense of self-preservation on the part of this very great and educated community of diplomatists and statesmen saw that the thing to do was to remove the privilege that we might not avail ourselves of it in the event of the necessity of its enjoyment. So we move to see that the question is, then, to remove that privilege; and the 1909 treaty is followed up as the 1909 treaty followed that of 1871, and as the treaty of 1871 was made to follow that of 1842.

What a slow but sure progress of years! What patience on the part of these able statesmen! What far-seeing glances through the area of distance and the ages of the century on the part of these eminent sources who, without hesitancy, with little impatience, and never, sir, at any time with discouragement, move along to the object of the single purpose of making Lake Michigan of America an international water!

Then, sir, as this purpose moves forward like a coiling serpent squirming its way through the sand, hidden, sir, from the view of those about it, yet surely ultimately found its way to the point that it ever has had in view in its long-distance reach. Thus we now reach 1932, and I now repeat the colloquy that I ask the Senators of the United States to hear as I repeat the query of the eminent Senator from Michigan.

We are having a committee meeting before the Foreign Relations Committee. The Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Rogers, appears before the committee. He has been charged with favoritism and partiality in behalf of Canada and Great Britain. He was charged with it by me. I have not withdrawn the charge. I adhere to it. I adhere to it in the fact that this gentleman, to whom were entrusted these negotiations by his chief, Secretary Stimson, gave no notice to the Senators who were interested, and who necessarily were involved in this great undertaking. The only person he saw fit to make a companion in these discussions and negotiations was one of those alluded to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] in his colloquy with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the chairman of the committee, as to that organization or society, whatever they are, who seem to have been able to contribute $500,000 for some purposes of propaganda somewhere; let us believe not touching in any form the United States Senate, or any Member of it, in any form of corruption or wrongful influence, but, let us say, sir, for whatever object.

This gentleman to whom I refer was Mr. Allen, former Senator from Kansas, appointed Senator by the Governor to take the place for a little while of the then Senator Curtis, who had been elected Vice President of the United States. I fell into error when the other day I intimated, or actually said, that Senator Allen was named to take the place of one who had passed away. Senator Curtis is still with us, and, while I hope that politically he and his party will continue in a moribund condition [laughter], I hope he personally will long be with us as a friend, fellow citizen, and a lovely gentleman.

I then turn to the question. The 1909 treaty provided the manner in which it could be denounced and ended, but in 1932 we were confronted with the treaty of 1909, which allowed a few years' enjoyment of and then our right to denounce it; with the treaty of 1871, which allowed nothing at all but a mere navigation by mutual consent and exchange; in 1842 we prohibited. From the prohibition it changed to a mere temporary allowance, from a temporary allowance to a contract of years, from a contract of years seeking what? We now have the colloquy.

I report from memory. Mr. Rogers proceeds to set forth that this former provision granted unto Canada as to Lake Michigan and Lake Michigan as to the St. Lawrence or the Welland Canal certain privileges. Many of these provisions are copied from the treaty of 1909, which Mr. Rogers says is practically the same as that of 1932, when my eminent friend, the able Senator from Michigan, sitting on the committee, being an eminent editor and a very honest publisher, and having not that quality of suspicion which sometimes comes into doubtful enterprises such as lawyers engage in, did not, as I think, quite see the drift of the reply of Mr. Rogers.

When Mr. Rogers then said, "It is about the same as the 1909 treaty", my able friend from Michigan, if I do not misquote the conversation and colloquy, said, "As I understand you, the treaty of 1932, this treaty we have here, is the same as to these rights as that of 1909, except that in the 1909 treaty the right was temporary?" "Yes." "And this present treaty makes the privilege permanent?" "Yes."

Indeed, that which they never had at all, and clamored for in the beginning, and that which finally was yielded out of a small degree of comity between nations, and that which later was contracted for for a very limited time, with the right to denounce and end it, was finally yielded through these convocations to which I have alluded, where no one of the Senate, and none interested, were allowed in the conference save this private gentleman, who represented a former position of an ex-Senator. It was assumed that he could whisper the seducing phrase in the ears of Senators in the hope of such being effective in convincing them of the wisdom of ratifying this instrument. He alone is permitted to sit with the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. Rogers, and the Minister from Canada, in the disposition of the rights of the whole of America. Since then it develops that this eminent gentleman was one of the society that had the compensation from that $500,000 fund, and this is the private citizen who is described as "private citizen" in this voluntary communication to the President of the United States describing this man, with not a word being stated as to his relation, knowing he was an ex-Senator by appointment, and that he was posing as an officer of this association described—he is sent in to the President to aid this treaty, with the declaration that is to be read to us, merely being present as a private citizen. We would conclude that he was merely invited in to gratify his curiosity in beholding the splendid personage of a Canadian Minister in his negotiations and to witness how easily a Canadian Minister in diplomatic dealings could overcome a mere American Secretary of State. I cannot but enjoy the amusement of the contemplation, as much as I deplore the unpleasant history of it.

Then, I call the attention of my able friend to the fact that, instead of the construction he gave yesterday, from his point of view so honestly obtained from his reflections on the subject, I assert the real one is just the very opposite. Otherwise, why this long, unbroken trend of constant multiplication of the events by which sooner or later they linked themselves and then locked themselves within the privilege of owning Lake Michigan?

If the former treaty, as my able friend from Michigan said yesterday, gave all the privileges, and that of 1871 did likewise, why this treaty, then, at all? Why change it at all if the relations of shipment or commerce on the part of America are enjoyed in Canadian waters anywhere to the whole degree that is expected on the part of our honorable rivals as to Lake Michigan? There would have been no reason for any change because the mutual exchanges compensated one for the other.

Then, the query rises: Why was it necessary to change the temporary character as to which up to this time there seems to have been no complaint lodged to justify the change by this manipulation, silently indulged, secretly enjoyed, finally consummated in darkness, making permanent the right of the British Empire to dictate the uses and own the territory of the United States within the sovereign State of Illinois, and enjoyment of equal privilege in the State of New York without the consent of either State?

I answer my able friend that he falls into error out of an honest construction that this was a mere arrangement for trade. I again inform him that under my construction, though it may seem very far from the views of those who are shuddering at the awakening this must present, the motive behind this treaty was something very far from the assertion of the mere enjoyment of Canada in the matter of a water shipment and the matter of water power. Otherwise there would not have been this expression on the part of the Government of Canada, referring to Great Britain, and stating that the privileges go to Great Britain, to be controlled under the regulations of Great Britain, and also of Canada, joining the two nations involved in this—one on the local questions, the other the imperial question—to make regulations upon its international welfare as it would ultimately behold it.

I will not be diverted from my construction. Alas, I am being fortified in my fears. Therefore, I ask my able friend from Michigan, Have I not quoted correctly the colloquy between himself and the Assistant Secretary of State while he was a witness before the committee? If I have not, wherein will he find there is an error? I beg him to feel free to correct if there be an error, or to make mention of an omission if I have been guilty of one.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator's quotation is correct, and I similarly quoted myself, from the committee records, in the colloquy on yesterday.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not have the pleasure of hearing the Senator's address, but I am pleased to have the Senator give ratification to my memory in quoting. Therefore the difference between the able Senator and myself lies in the construction, as to the meaning, the purpose, of making permanent that which was previously but temporary, and that which was temporary was previously no contract at all but a mere indulgence of comity, and that which at the time was only that which succeeded that which had been a forbidden measure, which forbade the enjoyment of that which has reached the point now where, under our contract, we have made permanent the privilege of a foreign country to take, literally, the territory, the soil, and the waters of the United States of America.

Mr. President, it was these facts alone to which I desired to address myself, because addresses on the pending treaty will continue in stages, from time to time, and it is well that the able Senator from Michigan has set the example, which I am very pleased to follow, of discussing the treaty in its different subject matters separately, and to this particular one I invite attention at this time, and I conclude as to this phase, expecting to resume at another time, save for one thing.

Thus I propound the question: Where is the privilege to be found in claiming Lake Michigan as a boundary water? Is there any history of this Government that has established as a boundary this water, this lake, which, by the process of nature, has been reposed within the folds of this great and blessed country, whose name is the United States of America, this land which has given assurance to the world of peace, friendship, and all the comity of kindnesses which nations could advance. Where is the foundation for any such assertion of Imperial Canada claiming for Great Britain Lake Michigan as an international water?

It will be remembered that as to this 1909 treaty there was some doubt in the minds of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations as to whether the purpose was not deliberately to move upon this lake with a view of taking possession when the treaty was made. It is evident that in the discussion of the treaty there was the contention as to Canada claiming this lake in some form, when, if I may quote again from memory the history of my country, the matter was brought before the Senate. Secretary Root, later a Senator of New York, then Secretary of State, was asked by Senator Bacon, of Georgia, a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

> Is there anything in this treaty which recognizes Lake Michigan as an international water or a boundary lake?

To which Mr. Root has to say—I quote from memory:

> There is not only nothing, but I yielded—

"I" meaning as the Secretary of State—> to certain other contentions in order that there should be no quarrel upon this question, nor even request. There is not only nothing in this treaty which recognizes the lake as such, but there has never been in any other. And it is now understood that it is not only not a boundary water but that it is specifically a sovereign water, in no wise international, and that this treaty is intended again to express that it is not an international water but is wholly and completely a sovereignty of the United States.

It was upon that assertion, I say to my able friend, and I ask him, when he comes to his address, which he will be kind enough to let me hear, if he differs, upon what that difference is founded—it was upon that assertion that that treaty received its confirmation and had Senator Root, then Secretary of State, stated to the Senate that this treaty of 1909 really had for its object that which it is now contended was its purpose, of making Lake Michigan—this body of water which blesses all civilization around which it revolves and its waters flash and flow—an international body, right then and there the treaty of 1909 would have been repudiated by the United States Senate. It would never have been adopted. It was only adopted upon the theory, as to that subject, that it had been established within the knowledge of both parties, and within the meaning of the negotiations, that it was not an international water, but wholly a body of water within the United States, and within the sovereign dimensions solely, and of jurisdiction of this America.

Mr. President, I therefore propound the query: What purpose has our honorable rival—for whom we have such great esteem, and trust nothing shall ever interfere with our comity and friendship—what purpose has Great Britain in gradually moving along to obtain possession, little by little, to the final end—taking the concession in the colloquy of my eminent friend from Michigan and the Secretary of State now to make permanent the arrangement which gives us a little in the way of shipment, of which we have little opportunity, for we have such a small American merchant marine—and very small, indeed, that which we have to go into the waters of Canada for any purposes—for this little to assume to grant to us of that for which we have no use, apparently in consideration of exchange for the gift of our land and home to a foreign country, perpetually?

If this treaty, sir, is confirmed by us, and then confirmed by Canada, the only way we may ever hope again to resume the property of our own to ourselves is then through first, negotiation, and with little hope—for the struggles would not have been made up to this time by Britain to obtain this water in the manner that has been carried on if it were not the purpose to combat any attempt ever to recover it. Our next step after negotiation will then be conflict in order to hold it; and it is that, sir, of which I see the danger, that I am seeking here to avoid, whether it shall come in the generation in which I live, as I pray God it may be avoided, or whether it shall come to those who shall follow us, which I hope will be a generation of peace and harmony among mankind. To use the words of Senator Lodge in the portion of the address that I just read, the only way to avoid such conflicts is to avoid entering into an arrangement that can lead to them.

Mr. President, on this phase I have, I am sure, taken more time than was my intention, but I say, sir, I fear a situation. I think, sir, it is in As You Like It, that the servant replies to the duke, as Shakespeare has it:

> Since the affairs of men still rest uncertain, let us reason with the worst that may befall.

I am bringing to the attention of the Senate that should this treaty not be ratified, we stand on the exact words of my able friend from Michigan, that the treaty of 1909 asserted all the rights which can be had under the present proposed treaty, and that under the treaty of 1871 nothing can be lost to Canada, while something is gained to us of peace of mind and the future disposition of quietude and harmony to humanity and to all mankind.

I therefore am anxious, sir, that these constructions which I dared tender shall be treated by my eminent colleagues around the Senate in such way as they feel is required for the purpose of getting at what is the real, truthful meaning of the thing we are asked to adopt.

Mr. BONE and Mr. VANDENBERG addressed the Chair.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington and then to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Illinois will acquit me of any desire to interrupt his train of thought.

Mr. LEWIS. I do. I know the Senator lives in a territory where this subject has from time to time been very much alive.

Mr. BONE. There is one point upon which the Senator might enlighten us and concerning which I am rather curious.

Is it not a fact that we have treaties with most of the countries of the world involving the right of their nationals to enter our ports with ocean-borne commerce, so that those rights stand on a treaty basis? In other words, the agreements respecting the use of the ports on our seaboards are reduced to treaty form. I do not myself know, and I am asking the Senator for information; and I am wondering what the status of those treaties would be and whether or not a treaty of this character, involving the use of the ports on the Great Lakes by British and Canadian shipping, might not involve almost the same relationship that we now sustain to these other countries where they use our ports on the Pacific and the Atlantic and the Gulf coast?

Mr. LEWIS. I must say to the able and ever industrious Senator, as we have observed, from the State of Washington, that I do not recall at this time the terms of these different treaties, and I could not answer him with the exactness of response which his query has a right to have. I, however, do see in his inquiry a feature that had not addressed itself to my mind. It is what relationship those countries would feel now. My mind quickly leads to an opposite conclusion. They will observe this favoritism they are extending to one country which we are not giving to them if their treaties extend only to the Atlantic and the Pacific.

I must say to my able friend that in the days when I was honored with representing the State of Washington as its Congressman at large—the State which he so honorably and with distinction represents here—and when I, as a lawyer, had something to do with shipping in such lawsuits of admiralty as were entrusted to my keeping, and had to do then with the shipping law and shipping interests, I always understood then, as we discussed the matters before the courts, that instead of having treaties we had mutual agreements and mutual understandings which were entered into invariably, not by the State Department, but by the relative representatives of government in the form of contracts. It might be said—I think I have used the words—that they were mutual understandings. I am not aware, however, of any absolute treaties. They may exist. I will seek the information in order to answer my friend from Washington.

I come, then, to the final conclusion. I should like to adopt the words of Senator Lodge. I turn, however, to my own to say, if there is a necessity for a waterway leading to the Atlantic Ocean, here is a great, broad piece of America. There lies the Gulf of Mexico, out by the way of New Orleans—that imperial, almost oriental, city of our land. Out toward New England we have the great privilege of cutting a canal and channel through which the waters may flow, and our ships enjoy, if it be necessary, the connection to a complete American waterway by the way of New York or by the way of New Orleans, and thus serve all the purposes which our American people should have. If Canada desires a waterway a little farther than what she has in very great plethora, we might say, of what nature has vouchsafed her, she may cut her way without ever cutting American soil, and both canals could exist, and now exist, in mutual enjoyment, thereby welding international friendship, and nothing occurring that could invite conflict.

Therefore let us, for our United States, say: If a waterway is to be cut at the expense of the American taxpayer, let it be an American waterway, owned by America, controlled by America. Then if the hour of an emergency shall arise under any circumstances where such becomes necessary for the essential protection of our land, we shall not be embarrassed by the claim of possession by foreign countries, and by having all about us stationed the batteries of death directed from an imperial power that has then become our enemy.

Our country has been lately at war. We are now at peace. There is no land with which we have conflict. We have turned ourselves at length to recognize all and ask of all that we come together in harmony in their local affairs and industrial concerns and to aid their very sad plight financially. In our own midst our people, our manhood, are as one in peace and purpose all returned from politics to patriotism. This is the hour we may say, paraphrasing the phrase which we find in King John, when Philip of Faulconbridge has occasion to proclaim upon an international security the paraphrase, and apply to our own sons:

> Now these her princes are come home again,
> Come the three corners of the world in arms,
> And we shall shock them. Nought can make us rue
> If American to itself do rest but true.

(The editorial from the Toronto Mail and Empire, referred to by Mr. LEWIS during his speech, is as follows:)

[From the Mail and Empire, Toronto, July 19, 1932]

WATERWAYS TREATY PROVIDES SHIP AND POWER CANALS AT SMALL COST TO CANADA

On its face the St. Lawrence Waterways Treaty, signed at Washington yesterday by Hon. W. D. Herridge and Colonel Stimson, is more favorable to Canada than any previous arrangement ever made with the United States. It is more favorable than anyone outside a limited Government circle could have hoped for. Though executed at the American Capital, it concedes to this country practically all the conditions long insisted upon by the most jealous guardians of Canadian rights. Congress must ratify the instrument before Parliament is asked to do so. The cost of the undertaking is to be borne mainly by the United States. The Canadian two-stage plan in the international section is adopted in place of the United States single-stage plan. Canadian sovereignty over the works in Canadian waters is absolutely established. To this end there is a complete segregation of the properties on the two sides of the border. Without altering in the slightest degree Canada's age-long policy of joint development of the St. Lawrence waterway, we obtain a 27-foot navigation channel from the Atlantic to the head of Lake Superior. What is still more important, we have retained the right to construct an all-Canadian waterway, at any time in the future, if the expenditure involved in such undertaking is deemed advisable. The judgment of the United States Supreme Court, requiring Chicago to reduce the extraction of water from Lake Michigan to a mere fraction of what it has been and is today, is embodied in the treaty.

OTHER ADVANTAGES SUMMARIZED

Not only this! The United States abandons its ancient contention that Lake Michigan is an "American lake." That great body of water has become forever, through this new treaty, an international body of water, which belongs to the St. Lawrence watershed instead of to the Mississippi watershed. While enlarged canals will not bring great ocean liners to Toronto and other inland Canadian cities, it will greatly stimulate water-borne traffic to and from these cities by Lake vessels and ocean tramps. Even Port Arthur and Fort William, more than 2,300 miles from the Straits of Belle Isle, will be in close touch by water with the shippers of Great Britain and the world. The deeper waterway means much not only to Ontario and Quebec and the Prairie Provinces, for it also confers upon the eastern maritime Provinces, and even upon British Colombia, opportunities for increased trade with the interior of Canada. On the eve of the imperial conference the treaty announces the creation of a larger field and new facilities for empire trade.

COST TO CANADIAN TREASURY ONLY $38,000,000

No feature of the treaty is more surprising or more satisfactory than the low cost to Canada at which the undertaking is to be carried out. Because of want of information, the press has carried all sorts of extravagant statements as to the heavy financial burden with which the taxpayers were to be saddled in a time of depression. As late as last Saturday a Montreal newspaper estimated that the Canadian people would be mulcted to the tune of $570,000,000. All such erratic predictions have been relegated to the realm of the absurd and sublimely ridiculous. The treaty provides that the cost of the deep waterways to the Dominion treasury will be $38,071,000. This total is reached by adding the $22,320,000 to be spent in the International Rapids section for property damages, rehabilitation work, and the Chrysler Island Canal to the $82,954,000 to be spent for locks and canals on the Canadian section, and by subtracting from the total $67,202,500 to be paid by Ontario to the Dominion on account of power works in the international section. This total cost of $38,071,000 may be cut to $33,638,500 if a proposed guard lock at Beauharnois is found unnecessary, which is altogether probable. These figures are based upon the 1926 estimates made by the international board of engineers on the project and since revised by that board. It is not to be forgotten that general construction costs are now down about 30 percent. The reasonableness of this remark is based on the fact that the Livingston Channel, in the Detroit River, was estimated to cost $7,000,000 and is now actually being built under contract for $3,400,000. If the cost of construction were to remain as low as it is today during the years of construction, the outlay by the Dominion treasury might not amount to more than $25,000,000. The cost to the United States is placed at $243,661,000, made up of $178,651,000 to be spent on the International Rapids section and $65,100,000 for channel deepening and other necessary works in the Upper Lakes. Canada is given credit for $128,000,000 spent on the new Welland Canal and for other construction work.

CANADIAN LABOR AND MATERIALS

Most of the construction work will be done in Canada. All the construction work on the national section will, of course, be done here, but there is more than that. Though the United States is to provide the $54,718,000 for works situated on the Canadian side in the International Rapids section, Canadian engineers, Canadian labor, and Canadian materials are to be used. All the labor and materials employed in the Canadian power development at Chrysler Island and Barnhart Island power plants is to be paid for by the Ontario Government and will, of course, be Canadian. As indicated by the maps published in connection with the treaty, the international section, which reaches from a little below Prescott to a little below Cornwall, is 115 miles in length. Most of the development occurs in Canadian waters.

MAY BUILD ALL-CANADIAN CANAL

Those who have been nervous about Canadian sovereignty should read article 5 of the treaty, which provides that each of the high contracting parties shall retain complete ownership of and complete legislative and adminstrative jurisdiction over all works lying on its own side of the international boundary, irrespective of the agency by which such works are constructed. Such works shall constitute a part of the territory and property of the country in which they are situated. This proviso is deliberately inserted to protect Canadian sovereignty over all structures lying on the Canadian side, even though these structures have been built with United States money. In addition to this Canada retains the specific right to construct at any time in the future, wholly within its own territory, alternative channel and canal facilities along the Great Lakes or in the St. Lawrence River, including the international section of the St. Lawrence. It has a right to use for such purely Canadian canal purposes whatever water there may be necessary for the operation thereof. As we indicated before, this clause places Canada in a position to build an all-Canadian waterway if at any time in the future it is deemed wise to enter upon the expenditure involved in such an undertaking. This is one of the most important and one of the most satisfactory points in a treaty which fairly bristles with satisfactory points.

TIMELY GESTURE TO THE EMPIRE

The Ottawa Government regards this treaty as of great importance to Great Britain and the Empire. It was therefore anxious to have it signed before the opening of the imperial conference, and it is to be congratulated upon having obtained its wish in this respect. It is stipulated in one of the articles of the treaty that all British shipping in all parts of the Empire shall have the right to navigation in the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence waterway for all time. This means that all British ships as well as all Canadian ships shall have access through the deepened water channels to the head of Lake Superior. In this sense the Great Lakes are merged with the oceans. The Great Lakes become the Mediterranean Sea of North America. It is not expected that great liners will ascend the canals, but there will be an ever-increasing flow of freighters and ocean-going vessels carrying cargoes inland and returning with outgoing cargoes. The deepened route will be of a special advantage to the shipping and trading industry of the United Kingdom, because, according to the gnomonic map projection, Montreal and Windsor, Ontario, lie in a straight line on the shortest route from Liverpool. The deep waterway will thus provide a remarkably direct route for the shipment of grain, flour, coal, and other commodities between interior Canada and Great Britain. We thus have Windsor, Hamilton, Toronto, Kingston, Montreal, and Quebec (with Fort William and Port Arthur only a little out of line) on an invaluable imperial trade artery connecting them with the mother country.

CHICAGO CHECKED—LAKE MICHIGAN INTERNATIONALIZED

As already noted, the treaty itself puts an end to Chicago's ambition to drain the Great Lakes for the benefit of a deep waterway to the Gulf of Mexico by way of the Mississippi Valley. It provides that the abstraction of water through the Chicago Drainage Canal shall be reduced by December 31, 1938, to an amount not exceeding an annual average of 1,500 cubic feet per second, in addition to the domestic pumpage by the city of Chicago. This embodies the decree of the United States Supreme Court in international law. Chicago must cut its present flow from 8,180 cubic feet per second to the maximum prescribed in the treaty. This arrangement, which permits a 9-foot channel to the Mississippi, cannot be varied except by international agreement. It is the first time in history that the United States has agreed to place the abstraction of water from Lake Michigan under international control. This really means that Lake Michigan is admitted by the neighboring Republic to be an international waterway, like the other Great Lakes. Henceforth it belongs definitely by international agreement to the St. Lawrence watershed and cannot be exploited for the increased benefit of the Mississippi watershed. It is further provided that there shall hereafter be no abstraction from the Great Lakes system to another watershed except by authorization of the international joint commission representing both nations. This constitutes a perpetual safeguard to the waters of the Great Lakes system, from Port Arthur, Fort William, and Duluth to the Gulf of the St. Lawrence.

OGOKI WATERSHED AS COMPENSATION

Canada gains another victory over the so-called "Ogoki diversion." It has been known for a long time that Ogoki Lake, lying north of Lake Superior, and all the waters flowing into it, which now find their outlet in Hudson Bay, can be readily diverted into Lake Nipigon, and thus into the St. Lawrence River system. Canada thus gains the right to divert 4,000 cubic feet per second of water into Lake Nipigon for use in power developments on the Nipigon, St. Mary, and St. Lawrence Rivers. It is estimated that this additional flow of water will furnish 520,400 horsepower, and this is all to belong to Canada. There is another important point in the fact that this access of water from the Ogoki watershed will compensate for the limited loss for the drainage canal which is to be allowed Chicago. In this connection it is to be added that the United States is to spend millions of dollars on the construction of compensation works in the Niagara and St. Clair Rivers. These works will, the engineers say, furnish adequate protection for navigation all down the Great Lakes system to Montreal.

CANADA GETS 4,000,000 HORSEPOWER, UNITED STATES 1,000,000

The treaty has its power side as well as its navigation side. The work in the international section and in the national section will develop about 5,000,000 horsepower. Of this, 2,000,000 horsepower will be available in the international section and 3,000,000 in the national section. Canada, that is to say, the Province of Ontario, is to obtain 1,000,000 of the 2,000,000 horsepower to be produced in the international section, but all of the 3,000,000 horsepower to be developed in the national section, which is wholly in Quebec, will belong to this country. This means that Canada is to obtain 4,000,000 horsepower and the United States 1,000,000 horsepower out of the whole St. Lawrence waterway development. We thus come in on a basis of 4 to 1, which ought to be satisfactory to most hydroelectric enthusiasts and to most private-power enthusiasts in Quebec. It is, of course, up to Quebec to use the power available in its own provincial area in the manner that it sees fit by agreement with Federal authorities. Our point at the present is that by the negotiation of this highly favorable treaty with the United States, Ontario and Quebec are protected for long years to come against a shortage of power. This power means much to the industrial future of the nation because it can be used to operate plants lying along the 2,300 miles of deep-water navigation in full communication with every part of the world. This combination of cheap power and transportation facilities will be one of the most remarkable in the world.

GREAT ST. LAWRENCE INDUSTRIAL REGION

It is probably not going too far to predict that with this new canal and power development on the St. Lawrence River, with little cost to Canada, the Great Lakes region and St. Lawrence Valley will, in the next few years, be lifted into a place of industrial leadership. The present depression is only a passing phase. The Deep Waterways Treaty, like the Imperial Conference, is a long step on the road toward the recovery of prosperity. As already indicated, with the deep-water channel to Great Britain and to other parts of the world, and with an abundance of cheap power for manufacturing purposes, a multiplication of industries along the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River is certain to occur within the next few years. We shall probably not be viewing the situation too optimistically if we say that the new St. Lawrence River development will give this part of North America a foremost place in industrial development. We believe, indeed, that the most highly industrialized section of the New World will bestride the international boundary.

IN HARMONY WITH PAST DEVELOPMENTS

We have already shown that there is to be no abandonment of Canadian sovereignty in the St. Lawrence. The treaty involves no departure from the historical Canadian policy regarding the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes. For many years the Canadian and United States Governments have cooperated in improvements to navigation in order to provide larger and larger vessels with adequate accommodation and especially adequate depths of water. The United States has used our canals and Canada has used the American canals. Much of the excavation work in the Detroit and St. Clair Rivers has been done by the United States in Canadian waters, with, of course, Canada's consent. On the other hand, channels deepened by Canada have been free to the United States. A good deal of this sort of work and of compensation work remains to be done between Lake Erie and Lake Huron, in the Niagara River, and in the upper St. Lawrence River and in the lower St. Lawrence. Our contention is that in working with the United States under the restrictions embodied in the treaty there is no departure from our long-established national policy.

REMOVING OBSTACLES TO NAVIGATION

The primary object of the treaty is to provide a 27-foot waterway from the ocean to the head of the Great Lakes. This depth of water is already available for all but a small fraction of the distance. That fraction lies between Lake Ontario and Montreal.

This part of the route, with its 14-foot canals, has for long constituted a definite obstacle to navigation. It has held up the development of the rest of the route. It renders the new Welland Canal, upon which we have spent $128,000,000, or nearly four times as much as the new development is to cost the Dominion treasury comparatively useless. This is a matter in which all of Ontario, all of Quebec, and indeed the whole of Canada, are intensely interested. The time has come to remove the hiatus in order that the greatest lake- and river-navigation route in the world may come into its own. The missing link is to be fitted into the chain. It would be foolish to leave the job undone.

TRIUMPH FOR BENNETT AND HERRIDGE

The waterways treaty between His Majesty, the King, and the President of the United States was signed by the Honorable W. D. Herridge, Canadian Minister at Washington, and by Hon. H. L. Stimson, United States Secretary of State. The Prime Minister has said that it fulfills the conservative pledge regarding the St. Lawrence made at the Winnipeg Convention of 1927, and the Prime Minister's own pledge in the same connection, which he gave in Winnipeg during the general election of 1930. We are not surprised at his frank assertion that no big interests are to be allowed to block the enterprise. The negotiation and the conclusion of the treaty illustrate the present Government's belief in the future of Canada. They also illustrate the driving power of the Prime Minister and his capacity for getting big things done. On the eve of the greatest empire conference the world has ever seen, he has been able to announce this new Canadian and imperial arrangement with the United States. To Mr. Herridge goes the main credit for the negotiation of the treaty. Ever since last October he has labored day and night to bring it about. He has made countless trips between Ottawa and Washington on this special mission, and with the backing of the Premier he has been able to secure an instrument which concedes to Canada practically all of Canada's demands. He has obtained a treaty which places the bulk of the cost on the United States and involves the Dominion Treasury in an expenditure of less than $40,000,000. This, and his success in obtaining a greatly increased number of air channels from the United States for radio purposes, amply justify his appointment to the Washington post. He would not have accepted that position but for the prospect of doing these two jobs for Canada, and his double achievement marks him as an international diplomat of first-class order. We do not think that any Canadian will take exception to this statement. In the language of the street, he has carried the message to Garcia, delivered the goods, and brought home the bacon.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, as I shake off the hypnotism resulting from the rampant eloquence of my colorful friend from Illinois, I rise only to submit a few cold, hard facts which occur to me as amply sufficient by way of reply.

I remind the Senate that the controversy between my friend from Illinois and myself arose from the alarming statement he made a few days ago that this proposed waterway will open a martial channel through which Great Britain could move into Lake Michigan and possess herself of our shores.

Mr. President, I find nothing in the Senator's eloquent response which moves me—I say with great respect—to change the view which I previously submitted. Indeed, it seems to me that the Senator and I are in substantial agreement upon the facts which sustain my previous conclusion. If I understand the situation correctly, the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Michigan agree completely that there is no navigation right in Lake Michigan of a contemporary nature conferred upon Great Britain or Canada by the terms of the pending treaty which Great Britain and Canada do not enjoy under the terms of the treaty of 1909. That is the crux of the matter. If we agree upon this premise, I can concede no conclusion other than that which I maintain. I repeat, there is no new right of contemporary navigation conferred upon either of these foreign countries by the pending treaty which is not enjoyed under the Treaty of 1909 and which has been in existence for more than two decades. The Senator and I agree upon that proposition.

Since we agree upon that proposition, we must agree, then, that there is no menace to be conjured up from any alien source under the terms of the new treaty which would not exist for a period of at least 1 full year under the treaty of 1909 ere we should have an opportunity to denounce it. Therefore, we must agree that we live today under any jeopardy, under any menace, which would be involved in the pending treaty short of the denunciation of the treaty of 1909 at the end of a year. Therefore, Mr. President, I contend that the present specter which the able Senator from Illinois parades before the Senate and the country by way of moving it through trembling fear to reject this great treaty is a phantom and nothing else. The Senate surely is not to be dissuaded from its duty by mere shadows.

We agree upon something else. We agree that after the pending treaty shall have been ratified the only difference which will exist between these navigation rights in Lake Michigan and the rights which exist now under the treaty of 1909, which it has never occurred to anybody to be afraid of, is that the rights under the treaty of 1909 are revocable upon a year's notice, while the rights under the pending treaty are irrevocable. The Senator and I agree that that difference exists. But I submit that it wholly fails to create a material discrimination.

I contend that that difference is immaterial insofar as the point submitted by the Senator day before yesterday is concerned, because if we cannot escape this allegedly malignant thing which he so fears short of a year's notice to Great Britain, our protection at the present moment is, indeed, inadequate to save the awful consequences which he conjectures. Hence there is a perfectly good reason why these rights should become irrevocable.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this is not the first time that navigation rights in these related waterways have been made irrevocable; this is no sinister novelty which the Senator from Illinois ominously uncovers. Oh, no. He himself has said that away back in 1871 there was negotiated a treaty containing an irrevocable right of navigation, and upon that occasion it was the Government of the United States which got the advantage through a commitment which permits it forever to navigate the mouth of the St. Lawrence River, which lies wholly within Canadian territory and wholly under Canadian sovereignty. I wonder why some vigilant British statesman was not on hand to warn the British fathers in 1871 that some horrible influence was possessing its diplomacy when we of the United States were permitted that irrevocable right of navigation in the great mouth of the great St. Lawrence River, wholly within Canadian territory, wholly and completely controlling forever the approach to the great inland waterways of the United States.

If there were any malign British purpose, Mr. President, to be exercised in these waters against the welfare of America, would Great Britain ever have agreed, as she did in 1871, to let us use forever, upon terms of equality, the great mouth of the great St. Lawrence River?

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I prefer not to do so until I shall have finished this thought, and then I shall be glad to yield.

I confess that I can see no danger of the nature which my able friend presents. I confess that when I find, for example, the present President of the United States and his able Secretary of State submitting this contract to us under the full belief of its value and safety I am unable to believe that they have been so blind to its conjured possibilities. I am unable to believe when the great Hearst newspapers, which it seems to me in years gone by have been the most utterly vigilant of all our newspapers in respect to advancing 100 percent Americanism, announce their belief in this treaty, and in the benefits to be derived from its ratification, that they have failed to canvass it for these hidden dangers and these secret implications to which the Senator refers. The truth is, Mr. President, they are not there.

The Senator asks why this right should become irrevocable in respect to navigation. I reply to him that in the very nature of this joint undertaking it is equally to our advantage that all of these rights should be mutually irrevocable, and that we had better not undertake any joint Canadian-American undertaking at all unless we are willing that these rights shall be mutually irrevocable.

How can we build a great hydroelectric dam across the international section of this river, a partnership affair—how can we proceed upon a stupendous international partnership development of that sort except as there be an irrevocable partnership in connection with it? Why should we be willing to proceed in any aspect of this partnership waterway except as we could be sure that we, the people of the United States, have an irrevocable right to use the Welland Canal constructed by the Dominion, wholly in Canadian territory, at an expense of some $130,000,000? It would be absurd for us to have anything to do with this enterprise except as we had an irrevocable right to navigate the Welland Canal. It is the cardiac artery of the enterprise. I cannot understand how the partnership prospectus could be embraced at all except as it be an irrevocable partnership in respect to the particular values involved as regards the rights of navigation, as regards the right of construction, as regards the mutual rights which each party recognizes in respect to the other.

There is a reason why this change is made. Whether the change be made or not, I must revert to the position which I took upon yesterday in complete disagreement—and again I say it with complete respect—with my able friend from Illinois that there is any abrogation of American sovereignty upon the Great Lakes involved in this situation or that there is any loss to us of any name or nature. I must reiterate that contemporary navigation rights, existing since the treaty of 1909 was ratified, are the precise and only navigation rights involved under the treaty now pending for the consideration of the Senate; and I must repeat that the Rush-Bagot agreement of 1818 prevents any use of these rights for military or naval purposes.

Mr. President, I had not wanted to proceed into the general debate upon the treaty so far as I am concerned today, and I have made this rejoinder simply so the record could be complete before the Senator from Illinois leaves the floor.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

As in legislative session,

On motion of Mr. REED, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the following Senators be excused from further service as members of the following committees: Mr. AUSTIN, from the Committee on Claims, and Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; that the following Senators be assigned to membership on the following committees: Mr. PATTERSON, to the Committee on Appropriations; Mr. HEBERT, to the Committee on Commerce; Mr. CAPPER, to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; Mr. DICKINSON, to the Committee on Rules; and Mr. GIBSON, to the Committees on Civil Service, Claims, Commerce, the Library, and Post Offices and Post Roads.

BANK-DEPOSIT INSURANCE

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have just been furnished with some amazing figures. They have been courteously furnished me by the managers of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation at my request. I believe this is the first official disclosure of the complete prospectus which has been developed in regard to bank-deposit insurance. It seems to me that the figures which I am now permitted to present to the Senate ought to bring cheer to the country, just as they certainly represent a thing which must have brought confidence and peace of mind to millions and millions of bank depositors throughout the country. Since confidence is the country's primary need, this contemplation is utterly important.

Mr. President, it is now officially disclosed that the grand total of bank deposits insured in the Nation under the terms of the so-called "Vandenberg amendment" to the second Glass-Steagall bill is 53,396,662. That is the number of insured bank depositors in the United States this afternoon, the number of depositors who enjoy deposit insurance and have enjoyed it since New Year's as the result of the action of the Congress which I confess to a pride in helping initiate. These deposits amount to $15,210,113,000. Out of 16,751 banks in the United States, 13,420 are insured.

These tables have been prepared at my request by the managers of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation in a very illuminating fashion. They show the complete picture by States. For example, using my own State of Michigan as a type, they demonstrate that in Michigan, where every one knows the banking difficulties have been supremely acute, out of 347 banks 335 are insured today, only 5 applying for insurance having been found ineligible. There are 1,055,862 insured accounts, the insured accounts amount to $254,096,000. That is a fair relative picture of the situation as it exists in each of the other States. These figures are so illuminating, so comforting, and so encouraging that I want to ask at this point, Mr. President, that they be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOLIDGE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statements are as follows:

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senate is familiar with my deep pioneering interest in the subject of bank-deposit insurance and my authorship of the formula which went into effect on New Year's day. I continue to believe that it is the greatest single contribution that can be made to the economic stabilization of the land. Having made the savings of America safe, I feel that we have builded the cornerstone in the edifice of recovery.

I want to take this opportunity to compliment without reservation the directors of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation named by President Roosevelt last fall. I am referring to Mr. Cummings, to Mr. Bennett, and to Comptroller O'Connor. I want to state in this presence that I have never seen a difficult task more ably or more sympathetically administered than this particular responsibility has been administered by them. I want to add, Mr. President, that they could not have done the things they have done had they not had complete cooperation from Chairman Jesse Jones and the other officers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, because the deposit insurance formula has been used by the Treasury Department as the fulcrum with which it has pried the banks of the Nation into a safe and dependable status.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the Senator would like to add also that he regrets, as all of us do who know Mr. Cummings, the fact that he is shortly to retire from membership on this Board.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cordially agree with the observation of the able Senator from Massachusetts. I have never seen, I repeat, a difficult, perplexing task done under adverse circumstances, under the pressure of speed, to a better net result than in the case of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation law. In the process of making the banks of the country eligible for this insurance there may have been times when the dictated requirements seemed harsh. There may have been situations in which judgments disagreed. There may have been errors on the side of safety. There undoubtedly were occasional mistakes. But, by and large, I repeat that the task is ably done. It was a revolutionary thing in our Federal banking. It was bitterly fought by the largest banking interests in the country. I shall never forget the difficulties that had to be surmounted before the so-called "Vandenberg amendment" was enacted into law. Many of those same difficulties persisted in the subsequent administration. Indeed, we still confront an incomplete experiment. But I am happy to bear witness that the adventure is launched under the most favorable possible auspices.

Mr. Cummings' letter of January 1, 1934, addressed to the President of the United States and describing the new year's inception of the insurance fund, shows that 97 percent of the deposits of the Nation are insured within the $2,500 formula. This is a very important fact. It is a very significant fact. It bears out the prophesies which I made in respect to the deposit-insurance formula at the time the measure was pending. I think it highly desirable for the sake of the record that the exchange of letters between Mr. Cummings, speaking for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and President Roosevelt upon New Year's Day, when the new system was inaugurated, should be printed in the RECORD, and I ask that that be done at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

JANUARY 1, 1934.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Pursuant to your request, I have the honor to submit to you a brief report of the work of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

We have insured 13,423 banks. The insurance covers deposits up to $2,500 until July 1, 1934, when the permanent provisions of the act become operative.

A careful survey shows that 97 percent of the total number of depositors are insured in full.

We found 141 banks ineligible for insurance. A number of them may be insured by making certain corrections. In other words, approximately 1 percent of the applying banks could not qualify. This remarkable record was due to the assistance given by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by the purchase from banks of preferred stock and capital notes.

I believe that the insuring of bank deposits will not only be of incalculable value in restoring public confidence in the Nation's financial institutions now strengthened, but that it will be of tremendous assistance in hastening the return of prosperity. It will banish the fear of the depositor as to the safety of his money and, from the banker's point of view, the elimination of the possibility of sudden and heavy withdrawals will make possible the expansion of credit for legitimate purposes.

The Federal Government has subscribed $150,000,000 to the capital of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Federal Reserve banks have subscribed $140,000,000, and in assessments the corporation has received over $37,000,000, making a total of $327,000,000 available for the immediate use of the corporation.

I should like to express my real appreciation of the untiring efforts and close cooperation shown by the other two directors of the corporation—Mr. J. F. T. O'Connor, controller of the currency, and Mr. E. G. Bennett.

The immediate task you intrusted upon your directors has been accomplished. We now direct our efforts to the advance of a great work—protect deposits and permit banks to function as useful instruments in the recovery program.

Thanking you for the opportunity to serve in this way, I am

Very sincerely yours,

WALTER J. CUMMINGS, Chairman.

MY DEAR MR. CUMMINGS: I congratulate you and Mr. Bennett and Mr. O'Connor because you have in these few months accomplished with complete success a gigantic task which the pessimists said could not possibly be done before January 1.

That 97 percent of the bank depositors of the Nation are insured will give renewed faith.

I am also happy to know of the fine cooperation given to you by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to point out that within the brief span of less than 2 weeks the operation of the Federal deposit-insurance fund has brought money out of hoarding; that it has been more effective in bringing money out of hoarding than all the threats and all the intimidations that were undertaken from other sources. It demonstrates that the American people did need encouragement to believe in their banks. It demonstrates that when we can restore a normalcy in our affairs bank-deposit insurance will be the major steel beam under the whole credit structure of this land. It will inevitably loosen credit through all these decentralized banking agencies throughout the land. I want to demonstrate that money is coming out of hoarding as a result of this particular piece of legislation.

I desire to call attention to a survey made by the United Press upon this subject. The heading is:

Banks' guaranty swells deposits. Nation-wide gain ranges as high as 78 percent.

I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BANKS' GUARANTY SWELLS DEPOSITS—NATION-WIDE GAIN RANGES AS HIGH AS 78 PERCENT IN THREE RIVERS

Increases in bank deposits throughout the country, ranging as high as 78 percent in Michigan, since the Federal deposit insurance went into effect January 1 were shown Friday by a United Press Nation-wide survey.

Reports from all parts of the Nation revealed hoarders taking their money from secret hiding places to banks. Some sections, such as Detroit and Kansas City, reported withdrawals from Postal Savings.

Many bankers reported the gains attributable primarily to the Government's guaranteeing of deposits up to $2,500.

The volume of savings accounts in the First National Bank at Three Rivers, Mich., has increased more than 78 percent, from $6,900 December 31 to $12,340, reported Raymond B. Linsley, president.

The new National Bank of Detroit reported a 25-percent gain in deposits since January 1, despite withdrawals to pay city taxes January 10.

NEW YORK LEAST AFFECTED

Universal confidence was reflected in the answers. Only in New York City was there little tangible evidence of the benefits of deposit insurance. Bankers explained New York institutions had not suffered as had many others.

In sections where deposits ordinarily increase at this time of the year most bankers believed the gains this year were more than seasonal.

The First National Bank of Chicago reported "people taking money out of safety deposit boxes and depositing it." It noted an increase of $7,000,000 in deposits since the first of the year, a slight amount above normal. The Northern Trust Co. of Chicago reported a savings gain of 100 percent.

"Deposits in Iowa banks are increasing steadily this month, an unusual thing, since deposits generally fall in January", reports D. W. Bates, State superintendent of banking.

Milwaukee deposits increased about $275,000 in the first 2 days and the gains since then have been "auspicious."

SAME STORY IN MISSOURI

Kansas City reported long lines of depositors at some of its banks and heavy withdrawals from Postal Savings accounts. St. Louis reported small gains, although definite figures were not available. Rural Missouri banks reported gains of 10 percent in deposits.

The Bank of America in San Francisco said deposits had increased in northern California cities, including San Francisco. A Los Angeles chain said volume of new savings was far ahead of any like period of any previous year.

W. J. Barnett, Oklahoma bank commissioner, found a 20-percent rise in deposits resulting from the guaranty.

Deposit increases in Cleveland banks ranged up to 5 percent. One bank's deposits rose $4,000,000; another $1,000,000.

Various Ohio cities reported gains. At Youngstown gains ranged to 50 percent.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator just used the words "guaranty of deposits."

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to the language. I did not mean to use the phrase "guaranty of deposits."

Mr. NORRIS. Of course that is very offensive to some gentlemen.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the guaranty of deposits is a totally different thing in State practice, as we have known it, from insurance of deposits as we are undertaking to operate it under this law.

Mr. NORRIS. The result, however, is just the same. Those who believe in guaranty of deposits attempt to attain the same result that those who believe in insurance of deposits attempt to attain.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct, although it is my view that it is much more practical and wise and safe to pursue the insurance formula than the guaranty formula.

Mr. NORRIS. Although, in doing that, we might have named it anything else just as well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FESS. When we were discussing the subject of guaranties I think the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] made the observation that in order to guarantee these deposits the Government itself would have to become the chief factor. That is the one very distinct difference that I would make between the guaranty and the insurance. I have always supported the insurance idea, having introduced legislation for that purpose, but have always feared guaranty unless the Government itself would become the banker.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, the guaranty of deposits, as the several States have used it and had experience with it, has been entirely unsatisfactory.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree to that. The difficulty comes in framing the law. I was very much in favor of something like we have now, and I think it has been demonstrated that it was an excellent thing to do. If we had called it "guaranty of deposits" instead of "insurance of deposits" it would have been just the same in effect and could well have been named that, but it would have incurred the hostility of a great many very able men. So there is something in a name, after all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, at any rate we are proceeding under the insurance formula, and it is a highly efficient and successful formula, and that is the point I am undertaking to register for the RECORD at this moment.

When I was diverted I was indicating the proof that this insurance already has largely won the battle against hoarding. I call attention to a news item from the Detroit News indicating in its heading—

Depositors flocking to Detroit banks.

Describing the result of the action of the insurance fund during the first week. I ask that this complete item be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPOSITORS FLOCKING TO DETROIT BANKS

Greatly increased activity, in the savings departments especially, of Detroit banks was reported Wednesday, the second day in which insurance of deposits up to $2,500 was in effect. Bankers were unwilling to estimate how much of the new funds being deposited could be attributed to the insurance plan.

"That the insurance plan is bringing money into the banks is evident from the amount of cash that was offered for deposit", Kenneth Paton, vice president and cashier of the Detroit Savings Bank, said. "It is evident that a lot of people who were holding onto their cash are now satisfied to place it in the bank. This is the report from all of our 27 branches as well as our experience at the main office."

Hugh McClelland, Jr., assistant cashier of the National Bank of Detroit, said there was no let-down in the business in the savings department from the rush experienced Tuesday.

"I am unable to say how much of the new business can be credited to the insurance plan", he said, "because our savings business has been increasing for some weeks."

The National Bank of Detroit also has branches throughout the city, as has the Commonwealth-Commercial State Bank. The Commonwealth-Commercial reported that its experience also led it to believe that the insurance plan was bringing funds from hoarding into the bank, citing a specific instance where $2,500 was removed from a safe-deposit box by the owner and placed in a savings account.

The United Savings Bank, doing a purely savings-bank business, also reported receipt of funds that apparently had been hoarded. One of the features of new funds being deposited, it was stated, was the large denomination of the bills.

The Manufacturers National Bank also reported gains.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I call attention to an article from the Washington Star, which indicates in its heading:

D.C. bank deposits pick up as result of insurance law.

I do not take the time of the Senate to read the article completely, but I call attention to this subhead:

Hoarded funds also put on interest.

I ask that this be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BANK DEPOSITS PICK UP AS RESULT OF INSURANCE LAW—PROTECTION OF ALL $2,500 ACCOUNTS BRINGS MONEY OUT OF HIDING—SOME HOARDED FUNDS ALSO PUT ON INTEREST—WEEKLY TRACTION PASSES CONTINUE IN FAVOR—FIRST-QUARTER SENTIMENT HOPEFUL

Deposits in Washington banks are said to have stepped up substantially since the law went into effect last Tuesday insuring all accounts up to $2,500.

"Hoarded" funds have been extracted from many a safe-deposit box and pushed through the bank-tellers' windows, bankers report, safe-deposit departments having been extra active during the last few days.

Of course most of the "hoarders" do not advertise the fact that they are transferring hidden money onto bank passbooks. However, some patrons have been frank to announce that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation's great protection innovation has abstracted all their fear of losing their money.

While it has been generally supposed in the financial district that there has never been much hoarding in Washington, perhaps there has been more than had been realized. At any rate, lots of small sums are coming out into daylight. When a depositor puts in $2,000 or more, all in $100 bills, it is a pretty good guess that the money came from a safe-deposit box. The same is true regarding small amounts of gold, about which there has been so much discussion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I also ask that a typical editorial describing the community reaction to deposit insurance be inserted in the RECORD. I refer to an editorial from the Adrian Telegram, Adrian, Mich., describing the typical reaction of the community, of the average citizen, to this new boon.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Adrian (Mich.) Telegram of Jan. 3, 1934]

IDLE DOLLARS COMING OUT

The Vandenberg amendment to the Glass-Steagall banking bill, providing for the Government's insurance of bank deposits up to $2,500 in any one account, became effective Tuesday. Thus in Adrian, where all four banks are participating members in the insurance plan, and in thousands of other communities, depositors enjoy a new form of protection that is as strong as the Government itself.

The primary purpose of Senator VANDENBERG's amendment is to make the average small depositor feel absolute confidence in the security of his bank account. It means that the depositor can get his money whenever he wants it and that the pledged faith of the United States Government stands behind the banks to which certificates of membership in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation have been issued.

It already has been reported that hoarded money is beginning to reappear at the windows of the receiving tellers, and more of it will be brought out of hiding as the people learn of the new protection afforded by Government insurance. A further development that may be expected will be the gradual elimination of the competition of the Postal Savings banks with general banking business—an elimination that will be orderly, that will be satisfactory to the Government, and that will be beneficial to banking and business generally.

The effect of the return of these idle dollars to constructive purposes will be very important. A dollar in hiding is just another piece of paper. It is no more useful than an automobile without a motor, a violin without strings, or a suit of clothes without buttons. When an idle dollar becomes a working dollar by being put into circulation, either through the owner's spending it or by his depositing it, the dollar again becomes useful and does things.

Credit is eased and extended when dollars go to work. Merchants are able to buy new stocks; farmers find that they can borrow to acquire feeding livestock. Business houses and factories can finance extensions, make improvements, add employees, and pay more wages. Working dollars are builders, and now there is no longer any reason why all of them should not be put to work. Most of the idle dollars of the last 3 years have been out of circulation because of their owners' lack of confidence. Government insurance of deposits ought to remove all fear and restore full confidence in the established agencies of exchange.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to make one observation, in conclusion.

It seems to me that the so-called "temporary deposit-insurance fund", meaning the formula which insures deposits up to $2,500, is already justifying itself beyond any possibility of successful controversy; and I shall be very much surprised if those banking interests of the country which fought so bitterly against us when we were undertaking to inject this formula into the Glass-Steagall law will persist, in the face of the demonstration which we now witness, in their contemplated effort to remove the deposit-insurance section from the Glass-Steagall bill. If they do persist, they will fail because they should fail in any such antisocial purpose. But, Mr. President, I think we should very solemnly consider whether or not the best welfare of the deposit-insurance idea itself would not be advanced if the temporary formula—and when I say "the temporary formula" I refer to the $2,500 formula—were to be made the permanent formula, at least until such a time as we could have had a substantial experience with it.

The Senate is familiar with the fact that under the terms of the second Glass-Steagall bill the so-called "Vandenberg amendment", which creates the $2,500 formula, expires by limitation upon July 1, and that at that time we proceed into the larger phase, undertaking to insure the deposits in the higher brackets.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a second, and then I shall be happy to yield.

I submit that since we know that the temporary formula protects 97 percent of the depositors, we have substantially reached our objective through the temporary formula, because it is in this 97 percent, this great mass of the people, that the hysteria occurs which generates runs. It is there that the social tragedies occur when banks fail. So that we may be well persuaded that we have met the mass challenge of the problem if we persist with the $2,500 formula instead of proceeding into these higher brackets, where inevitably we increase the hazard which the fund must confront; and in return for increasing that hazard in a degree which may be questionable—I admit it is a controversial point—in return for increasing the hazard to that great degree, we obtain an increased insurance for less than 3 percent of the depositors in the country, and they in the main are the larger depositors who are amply able to look out for themselves and take care of themselves.

It is for that reason that this afternoon, as I present this preliminary report from the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, I am suggesting a careful, unprejudiced consideration in this session of the Congress of the proposition that we might well make the temporary formula the permanent formula, and not step on into these higher insurable brackets, at least until we have had more than 6 months' time in which to test the formula.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire to be certain that I understood the figures the Senator employed in the table that he introduced a moment ago. I believe they were to the effect that there were over 53,000,000 deposits in the banks of the country that come under this insurance.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BONE. And that 97 percent of all of these deposits are under $2,500.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; all of these deposits are $2,500 or under, and they represent 97 percent of the total number of deposits in the country.

Mr. BONE. That is what I mean; in other words, that the guaranty of insurance covers 97 percent of the total number of depositors. Is that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BONE. Can the Senator advise us how much of the total money on deposit in these 53,000,000 accounts is represented by this 97 percent of depositors?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cannot answer the question with the authenticity that I have given the previous figures, because that particular computation has not yet been made, except in a general way. I should say to the Senator that it is the opinion that not over 30 percent of the total banking resources of the country are involved in this 97 percent of insured deposits.

Mr. BONE. Of course, I cannot attempt to enlighten the Senator on the figures he has employed; but there were some figures employed by the Federal Reserve System in a study of bank deposits made last May, I believe, and reported in the July bulletin of the Federal Reserve System, in which they point out that 97 percent of these accounts, being $2,500 or under, represented only about 23 percent of the total bank deposits of the country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is correct in quoting the Reserve bulletin.

Mr. BONE. What I desired to add is that that is rather a startling commentary on the amount of money that 97 percent of the bank depositors of the country have been able to get into the banks.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. It is upon the basis of that discrepancy that I venture to suggest that the other 3 percent of the depositors do not require protection at our hands. I think they are amply able to protect themselves.

Mr. BONE. I quite share the Senator's viewpoint about that; but I am merely trying to point out the poverty of these bank accounts, in that 97 percent of 53,000,000 bank deposits represent only 23 percent of the total bank deposits that come under this act. I am further advised—and perhaps the Senator will enlighten me if I am wrong—that when this guaranty of insurance is stepped up to $10,000, that will cover nearly 100 percent of all the accounts—ninety-nine and some fraction percent of the total accounts of the country. The remaining accounts amount to about one tenth of 1 percent, or approximately one one-thousandth of all the bank accounts in the country are over $10,000. Can the Senator advise me about that?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I have not those figures.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Do I understand that the Senator is of the opinion that under this deposit-guaranty law which we enacted, which the Senator has spoken about here today, these accounts should not be guaranteed beyond the figure of $2,500?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator knows that that is the present law, which started on New Year's Day.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes; and, as I understand, the Senator is of the opinion that it should not be stepped up.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Michigan is expressing the view that since we are having such a satisfying experience with the $2,500 limitation, we might better proceed longer than 6 months under the $2,500 limitation, and gain a broader experience of the whole subject before we undertake, if ever, to go into these higher brackets and insure these stupendous deposits which are in the hands of men who ought to be able to look out for themselves. They usually do.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I might say, for the information of the Senator from Michigan, that I am rather in sympathy with his suggestion, for the very reason that it would be a greater hardship on the people of this country who have on deposit sums not reaching the maximum guaranty of $2,500 to lose that $2,500 than it would for the man who has amounts in excess of $2,500, because I believe it is true that the persons who have on deposit in the banks amounts in excess of $2,500 are the possessors of property other than the savings represented by deposits.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. REYNOLDS. There is one other matter I am desirous of bringing to the attention of the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Permit me just a moment. Furthermore, the Senator and I both have a common interest in the preservation of this deposit-insurance system for the benefit of this mass of depositors. Therefore, it is incumbent upon us to see that this deposit-insurance fund is constantly kept solvent so that there can be no jeopardy in connection with it. It must face a minimum of strain.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that since less than 30 percent of the banking resources are involved in this protection of 97 percent of the depositors, we have purchased a maximum protection with a minimum risk to the integrity and the solvency of the fund, and all those who are interested in the preservation and the perpetuity of this fund want to keep the hazard as low as possible, so that the system itself always will be self-contained and self-supporting. We want also to disarm its critics so far as we can. I now yield to the Senator further.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I have been informed that since the guaranty bank deposit law went into effect we have not experienced the depositing of money in the postal depositories as heretofore we did. Has the Senator any information on that?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have sent for those figures, because I think the observation is correct, although I cannot justify it authentically at the moment. I will say to the Senator that I have already put into the RECORD ample proof that money has come out of hoarding and gone into the regular banking structure of the country in an amazing degree in the last 10 days as the result of this steel beam which has been put under the confidence of these American depositors.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This concludes this initial report upon the new Federal deposit system. I have faith that it will continue spectacularly to justify itself. I hope it may be safeguarded against any possibility either of failure or of repeal. We have belatedly given the depositors of the Nation the protection they deserve. Let us nourish the undertaking and preserve its benediction.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O merciful Father, condescend to hear our prayer. We pray that in character we may be simple, industrious, devout, and, above all, sincere. Thou who art a most gracious and a forgiving God, we beseech Thee, with a sense of unworthiness, to stimulate us each day with these abiding virtues. Be unto us a voice of that righteousness which is older than time and of that love which shapes eternal destinies. Keep, oh, keep us from the torture and the tangle of an evil conscience and crown us with minds powerful and rich in knowledge. Heavenly Father, may our lives pour forth that charity for all men which is the livery of heaven. Over these restless, eager, and vehement days, do Thou brood in wisdom and in peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be recognized at this time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to speak to the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—if there is going to be general debate before we start the consideration of the appropriation bill, after the gentleman from Nebraska addresses the House I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 30 minutes. Personally I would just as soon make my remarks in general debate on the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I understand the Interior Department appropriation bill is to be taken up today, and I have an agreement with the gentlemen on the minority side to be very liberal about debate; in fact, I believe they want 3½ hours on the other side. There will be ample opportunity for Members to make speeches, it would seem to me, all day today and perhaps tomorrow.

Mr. BYRNS. Will it be agreeable to the gentleman from Colorado to yield first to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD]?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. While I feel I ought to make first a statement about the bill, I am sure there will be no objection to yielding to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman's program.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think there will be no objection to the gentleman from Nebraska going first.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object for the purpose of getting some information. I should like to ask the Speaker whether or not the reference of the monetary bill has been definitely decided or is the decision of that question to be held in abeyance?

The SPEAKER. The bill has been definitely referred.

Mr. McFADDEN. It has been definitely referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights and Measures?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6951) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes; and pending that, may I ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON], the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, what his suggestion is as to general debate?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I think we might as well go along today with general debate and determine about the time later. I have requests for 3½ hours.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That will be agreeable to me.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that general debate proceed on the bill and that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that general debate proceed for today and that the time be equally divided and controlled by himself and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 6951, the Interior Department appropriation bill, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, to mortals has not been given positive knowledge as to the abode of souls which disappear from the earth life. I do not know for sure that the great soul of William J. Bryan is able to peer down this morning from its safe place in the Paradise of God and observe the doings of mortals here in our America, but I love to believe that possibly our Bryan is in a blissful state in which he may have been privileged to observe in recent times the constant trend toward the full and beautiful fruition of his own wonderful dream of a governmental financial policy in the United States altogether free from the dictation of financial pirates.

I do not know, nor do I assert, that our doings here today are within the knowledge of our Bryan, but I love to believe that his great soul may be this very morning looking down approvingly upon the march of our people toward freedom from bondage to a piratical crew of financial buccaneers who through the years have ravished the Government at Washington and the people of the Republic.

Possibly the tones of my voice in this moment may be traveling upon one of God's own radio waves to the great receiving station of the universe way up there beyond the star line, and if so, I shall be hoping that the great Commoner may be listening in while I shall be making report of the progress of our mighty and good ship "America", under command of Captain Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The captain and crew of that good ship, after long and soul-trying battle against the elements, at last see the waves subsiding, the skies lightening, and, through the clearing mists, outlines of the harbor of peace and prosperity which they seek.

But, hold! What is this apparition which also arises from the mist?

It is a spectacle which has brought terror to the hearts of thousands. Bearing down upon our vessel we can now plainly see the strange craft. At the masthead it flies a black flag emblazoned with a skull and crossbones. We recognize it as the craft of financial piracy. We see that it is commanded by Capt. Kidd Morgan and manned by a motley crew. We can see the gleam of greed and avarice in the eyes of the officers and crew at the prospect of another easy prey.

Often has this pirate craft fallen upon its victims when the captain and crew of the ship of the Republic were weary from long and arduous vigils. What great sport the plunder of the defenseless has been for the Morgans, the Mellons, the Mills, the Meyers, the Mitchells, the Wiggins, and their pirate ilk.

But, now! How different is the situation.

Our captain is not paralyzed by fear. Our crew is not confused by despair. Weary they are, but determined. Calm, order, and confidence prevail. Few are the faint-hearted.

Clear and ringing comes our captain's command: "Stand by to repel pirate boarders."

Just as clear and ringing comes back the response of every true American: "Aye, aye, sir."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I want first to express my appreciation of the entirely amicable cooperation of the membership of this Interior Department subcommittee in the preparation of this bill and our unanimous action upon it. I believe it would be interesting to give the House a brief birdseye view of this annual supply bill for the Interior Department. It covers a very wide field of activities affecting the welfare of many millions of people, extending from the Arctic Circle to the Equator. I will not go into details at all, but just mention a few of the major activities provided for in the bill for the next fiscal year.

The bill carries an appropriation of $31,098,504. That appropriation is $19,380,767.67 less than the bill for the current year. It is the greatest cut that has ever been made in the Interior Department annual appropriation bill, that has ever been made during the past 13 years since that committee was organized at the time of the adoption by Congress of our present Budget system.

The bill provides for practically nothing whatever but salaries and maintenance. There is absolutely no new construction provided for in the bill. In other words, it is purely a Budget bill as it comes to us, and there is no new legislation upon it.

I do not believe there is an item or sentence in the bill subject to a point of order.

I ought to at the outset explain that a great many of the activities heretofore provided for in the Interior Department are being and will be taken care of by the Public Works Administration. The Public Works Administration has allocated up to November 30, 1933, $197,501,811 for the work that comes under the Interior Department. So that the $31,098,504 that this bill carries is a comparatively small item in view of the enormous amount that is going to be spent during 1934 and 1935 upon the activities that come under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department.

We found that the cuts have been so large by the Budget that this committee has made comparatively very little cuts or alterations in the Budget estimates. The total cuts, all told, that we have made amount to only $110,952, and those are on items that we felt for various reasons might be pared down a little without any injury.

In explanation of the very large cut of $19,380,767, I should say that is practically all because of the fact that there is no new construction in the bill. Heretofore we have carried a large amount of construction work in this bill every year.

The allocation from the Public Works Administration for construction throughout the United States provides an enormous amount of employment. There are now, I think, 178,000 employees who are working on these allotments. So that it has been and is of very great importance in that way for the relief of unemployment.

I might say that for several years there has from time to time been added to the Interior Department various bureaus, services, boards, and activities, and since we prepared this bill last year the President has by Executive orders added to the Interior Department a large number of activities which we are for the first time providing for in this bill.

For instance, Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital; the Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission; Public Buildings Commission; Agricultural and Veterans' Administration Buildings; National Military Parks, Battlefields, and Monuments; National Memorial Commission; Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway; Federal Board for Vocational Education; Fine Arts Commission; George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission; Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission.

Those are some of the matters that have heretofore been handled by the independent offices bill. Some of them come from the War Department.

THE SECRETARY'S OFFICE

I take up now the offices themselves. In the office of the Secretary of the Interior our bill carried last year $1,104,270. This year the bill carries $1,165,285. The reason for that is because of the additions to the Office of the Solicitor. In other words, 56 lawyers who were taken from the Land Office, and the Indian Service, the National Park Service, the Geological Survey, and other activities, and put under the Solicitor's Office for the purpose of coordinating the legal work of the Interior Department. It is believed that if they are under the one head—all these attorneys in the various bureaus—they can do more efficient and systematic work.

Another order of the President of April 29 last provided that all Interior Department investigation work throughout the United States should be coordinated under one head. It has been placed in charge of Mr. Louis R. Glavis, as Director of Investigations of this consolidated Division of Investigations. That division has authority to investigate practically anything under the sun that comes under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department. Their activities, of course, are limited to the Interior Department, but it is looked upon as being a systematized and coordinated effort for the purpose of securing more efficiency and, we hope, economy.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE

I come now to the Land Office. A year ago in the present bill we gave the Land Office $1,342,050. This year we have given them $788,000. That is a cut of $554,050. We made that large reduction principally because of the elimination of the work heretofore being done in the surveying of public lands. We added $10,000 above what the Budget recommended for the printing of the official United States maps. Heretofore, as most of you know, we have had a very good United States map. It showed where and when our Government obtained much of the territory that is now within our boundaries. It was an educational, interesting, and very instructive map. One that all of us have always been delighted to send to the various high schools, chambers of commerce, and other organizations throughout the country. They are exhausted. We feel that that is too important a document to discontinue. They cost the Government only $2 each. Therefore we added for that purpose $10,000 from one source, and $5,000 from another item, thereby authorizing the printing of 7,500 of those maps. If they were all apportioned among the Representatives and Senators. that would give each only about 12 maps. But, of course, they cannot all be given to Congress.

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

Next I come to the Bureau of Indian Affairs. First, I shall speak about an act that Congress passed last spring. That act authorized the Bureau to submit to the Congress a form of an alternate budget. We gave the advocates of that system a full opportunity to be heard, and after they had thoroughly presented the matter we decided not to accept that form of budget. It would shorten the bill and reduce the expense a little and simplify appropriations some. But our objection to it is that it is to make lump-sum appropriations. When lump-sum appropriations are made, Congress largely loses track of how the money is being expended or where it goes. The main Appropriations Committee and this committee have always been opposed to large lump-sum appropriations wherever they could be avoided. The total amount recommended by this bill for all the Indians throughout the United States is $16,269,010 for the coming year. That is $2,697,535.67 less than last year. In addition to this sum there is an item of $1,414,915 that is recommended to be appropriated from tribal funds. I should say that the tribal funds of the Indians have been very greatly reduced in the last few years by reason of their not being able to get much in the way of receipts from their oil lands or from their sales of timber. Consequently the Government is compelled to supplement those appropriations for the Indians. I call the attention of the House to this large map, upon which you can see just where the various Indian tribes are located throughout the United States. Each one of the red circles on the map represents a tribe of Indians.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The appropriation for the maintenance of the Indian Bureau is still paid out of the funds of the Indians themselves, is it not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No, sir. Generally speaking, the Indians have no funds for that purpose. Where any of them have funds, they are expended principally for the benefit of those particular Indians.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I mean the salary of the Indian Commissioner and the other men employed in the Indian Bureau. Those things are paid out of the funds of the Indians?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; those salaries are paid out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Then I was informed wrongly the other day at the Bureau.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The annual running expenses and maintenance of the Indian Bureau and the salaries of the officials and all expenditures of that kind come out of the Federal Treasury. There are not sufficient Indian funds for those purposes. In fact, the Indians' funds in recent years are being so depleted that we have to supplement them very largely.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am glad to admit that I have been misinformed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We recommend in this bill $1,414,915. Last year the bill carried $2,249,700. This is made possible because there is an enormous amount of money that is made available for the Indians under the general public works. I will give the House those items later on.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. About $800,000 is appropriated in this bill for reimbursable funds?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We have $1,414,000 recommended from tribal funds.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. For what projects are those reimbursable funds put in the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They are for the maintenance, support, betterment, general welfare, and upkeep of the Indians, paying their current necessary expenses and care of their children.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. They have been in the past for such irrigation and reclamation projects as were assessed against the Indians.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Where the Indians have funds, we try to see that they are expended for useful purposes as much as we can. I think most of the large sums of public-works money are or will be wisely expended. I hope so. They must have irrigation works and a great many improvements to enable them to support themselves.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is what I wanted to get at—what this was being appropriated for.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will give the gentleman the break-down of the Indian expenditures as I go along. For industrial assistance last year we appropriated $1,233,881. This year we appropriate $1,060,510. That is a reduction of $173,371, and we cut $7,000 under that. For irrigation and drainage last year we appropriated $864,914, and this year $397,855, a reduction of $467,059.

For the education of the Indians we appropriated last year $9,386,230, and this year we recommend $7,990,565.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Kindly let me make an explanation first. Concerning the education of the Indians, for many years we have built up a large number of Indian boarding schools, scattered throughout the country. We have been sending approximately 11,000 children to those schools. The present Commissioner of the Bureau, John Collier, has decided that those schools are not only unduly expensive but that they are really not bringing about the objects we had hoped might be accomplished; so that now the Bureau is starting on a policy of gradually reducing the boarding schools and building up day schools for Indians in the communities where the Indians are located, so as not to send the children 500 to 1,000 miles away from home. His object is to educate them nearer to their homes and families and, also, as far as possible, have the Indians go to the day schools with the white people, so as to get in contact with the white people. Many people think that is along the line of a proper solution of the Indian problem which has been before our country for 150 years. It undoubtedly will save a great deal of money. There is no question but what we can pay tuition for Indian children in an Indian day school or public school cheaper than to send them away from home. There are advantages and possibly some disadvantages to some Indians in that policy. It is a question that our committee is passing up to this House.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. If the gentleman does not want to pursue the question any further, I will not interrogate him; but I should like to ask if the committee has considered the difficulties attendant upon a change of policy, such as the inadaptability of the young Indian pupils until they have reached a certain point of development, their clothing, their mode of living, their speed of progress, and all those things.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we have very seriously considered those questions, and there is a great deal in what the gentleman says and the questions he raises; but I am going to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], who knows more about Indians than anybody on the floor of this House, and who has lived among them all his life, to present this matter to this House in detail later on.

Mr. RICH. In speaking of the various savings which it is intended to be made with reference to the Interior Department, the gentleman made the statement that much of the work that had hereofore been done by the Department of the Interior is now being done by the P.W.A.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And various other relief activities; yes, sir.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman think the work which should be acquired in the Department of the Interior can be better administered by those activities that are set up temporarily rather than by the permanent organization of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say frankly, as the gentleman knows, Congress last spring appropriated $3,300,000,000 for public works and for the relief of unemployment. That money was placed at the disposal of the N.R.A. and the Public Works Administration, and those officials have been allocating those funds ever since and performing a wide variety and an enormous amount of work. Whether their allotments are wisely made or efficiently expended, this subcommittee cannot pass upon. We have no authority or jurisdiction over that matter. It has passed out of our hands and is not now any part of the business of the Appropriations Commiittee. Our committee has inquired into those expenditures, and I am telling the House about them to show why it is unnecessary for us to carry in this bill any appropriations for any public works and any of those matters that would otherwise be provided for in this bill.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman think that is the wise thing to do?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman just mentioned the money it was hoped to be saved by the Department by the elimination of non-Indian reservation boarding schools?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. I wonder if the gentleman is acquainted with the estimate made last summer by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Collier, that the complete closing of six of the largest nonreservation Indian schools in the country, having physical plant valued at something more than $4,000,000, would effect a saving of only a half million dollars?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; we have inquired into that matter, and I will say to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] that Mr. HASTINGS will later discuss that question exhaustively. There are two sides to the matter, very distinctly.

Mr. MOTT. I am sure there are.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My thought about the matter is there will have to be some distinctions. That proposed policy may be wise in some places, but it will not fit in well in others. I think that where there is a tribe of Indians that are closely settled they can and should have a good school there, but where they are scattered all over the country, there are no school facilities for a great many of them, especially for the full-blood Indians. I think, as far as is reasonably possible, we should try to adopt whatever system or policy is necessary to give every Indian child an opportunity to get some elementary education to help make himself and herself self-supporting. But I do not want to argue that now because the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] will go into that in detail.

Mr. RICH. As chairman of the committee handling this matter, I should like to ask the gentleman if he believes the Department of the Interior should still do the work it has been doing, rather than having it done by these temporary organizations?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I do not feel that I should express an opinion upon that matter, because that was emergency legislation, and I cannot speak for the entire membership of the Committee on Appropriations. Of course, regular committees could much more systematically and economically handle those matters than temporary organizations. But I do not want to argue the wisdom of the various recovery expenditures and activities. I am simply telling the House that there are two new policies being inaugurated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs. One is to reduce the boarding schools and correspondingly increase the day schools for Indians in both Indian and white schools. The other is that where lands are allotted in severalty, 160 acres to each Indian, scattered all over the country, the desire is to change that system and to preserve those lands for the tribe rather than allowing them, when an Indian dies, to have the land sold and the proceeds dissipated. They are very large and far-reaching problems, and I do not have time to argue them now.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. The gentleman spoke of several reductions, one as high as $500,000 in one place. Are those reductions made entirely by cutting off activities of the Department, or are they caused by reduction in salaries on account of the 15-percent pay cut?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, that half-million-dollar reduction was in the General Land Office for surveying public lands. The Budget and this committee cut it out because that work is going to be done out of Public Works funds. No salaries are reduced or employees discharged on account of that reduction.

Mr. MARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MARLAND. In the reduction for the support of Indian schools recommended by the Budget, has there been a reduction for the maintenance of the agricultural school at Chilocco, Okla.?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], I think, could inform the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. The capacity of the school is reduced. The amount is carried in the bill under the title of education.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that the large Indian boarding schools have not been abandoned, and it is not contemplated that they will soon be abandoned, but they are being reduced in their numbers insofar as the children can be placed in day schools near their homes. A few small nonreservation boarding schools are being discontinued, I understand.

Taking up now the item of conservation of the health of the Indians, last year we appropriated $3,302,800 for this item. This year we are appropriating $3,264,595. I may add that there are no appropriations carried in the bill for new hospitals, but $1,735,500 is allocated for Public Works funds for this purpose.

Under the heading, General support of the Indians, last year we appropriated $2,141,900 for this item. We carry exactly the same amount in the bill this year. There have been some administrative savings under the Economy Act, and they have resulted in a cut of something like $180,000 in the 1934 appropriation bill, but this amount is offset because we have appropriated that amount in this bill owing to the depletion of tribal funds.

Taking up the Bureau of Reclamation, last year we appropriated $3,003,000 to the Bureau of Reclamation. This year we have appropriated $860,750. This represents a cut of $2,142,250 in the Reclamation Bureau, but I ought to say that in lieu of the cut we have made in the Reclamation Bureau, and by reason of it, the Public Works have appropriated and allotted to the Reclamation Bureau $104,220,000; so the Reclamation Service is well provided for.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. Was the amount allotted by the Public Works Administration so allotted upon recommendation of the Department of the Interior or was it done on the initiative of the Public Works Administration?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Secretary of the Interior is at the head of the Public Works Board. This amount has been allotted by that body, and we have practically taken it out of the bill. If you will look in the hearings, you will find the complete itemized break-down and everything I am presenting to you.

Last year we appropriated for the Geological Survey $1,992,500. This year we are appropriating $1,303,060, but it should be said that a large part of the amount we appropriated last year was impounded, so they did not get it. The amount recommended for this year represents a cut of 58 percent below the 1932 appropriation. Under the Public Works Administration, however, they have received $3,741,074. So they are not hurt to any great extent.

For the National Parks Service last year we appropriated $8,944,976, including appropriations transferred because of the transfer of new activities to this Service. This year we are giving them $6,319,640, a cut of $2,625,336; but in lieu of this cut of $2,625,336, the Public Works Administration has allowed them $25,000,000. Thus it will be seen the National Parks Service is being taken care of.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I am very much interested in the gentleman's discussion because the gentleman has studied this subject. We who do not know as much of these matters as do the members of the committee are very desirous of knowing whether the gentleman's committee made the recommendation that the Public Works and these other organizations do this work for the Department rather than having the Department do the work itself.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; we have never been consulted about any of those public-works expenditures. We naturally know something about all those matters that we have handled for many years—the Indians, the national parks, the reclamation and irrigation, and land-office and public-lands matters, and so forth, but we have at this time nothing to do with the way those moneys are being expended.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman approve of it?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In the rush to furnish employment and construct public works, I think those agencies are doing the best they can. Of course, much of it is done hastily and there will be much waste. But all the enormous amount of Government work that is now going on is entirely too much for any one committee to handle, and as I have stated before this committee has no connection with it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 additional minutes.

As I say, the National Parks Service is well taken care of; but in dealing with this increase of $25,000,000 for the National Parks Service there must be taken into consideration the enormous number of activities that were taken from other services and put under the National Park Service. I shall give you a little idea of it. In establishing this new office the name was changed from National Park Service to National Parks, Buildings, and Reservations. The transfer involves 11 national military parks, 11 national cemeteries, 10 battlefields, 4 miscellaneous memorials, and 8 memorial projects.

The activities of the Public Buildings Commission and the Public Buildings and Parks in the National Capital have been transferred to this office and consolidated into a single item, with an appropriation, as recommended by the Budget, of $4,054,000. I may say that we cut off $54,000 there, because we thought that savings should be effected in the purchase of supplies and equipment and the purchase of heat, light, and power. We have tried to force them to do so. We believe they can do it. The $4,000,000 that has been appropriated takes care of the cleaning of practically all the Government buildings and offices in the downtown area and provides for the service of elevator operators, policing the Mount Vernon Memorial Highway, and, generally, appropriates for 2,762 employees.

It is estimated that when the Triangle buildings are taken over during the coming fiscal year this organization will operate over 12,000,000 square feet of office space, exclusive of the Agriculture and Veterans' Administration Buildings. The operation of the new central-heating plant is also provided for in this item.

For the Office of Education proper we have recommended $233,000. This is $37,000 less than the appropriation for the current year. However, let me have you understand that, while we have cut $37,000 from the appropriation for the Bureau of Education, a large amount of the money that was appropriated last year was impounded and they never got it. In reality the appropriation we are providing in this bill is $10,500 more than they got last year. So, as a matter of fact, we do not feel they are being hurt or that they have any ground for complaint.

As I said before, the Federal Board of Vocational Education is an activity that has just come to our committee. We have never had it before. Heretofore it has been handled in the independent offices appropriation bill. This activity was transferred to the Interior Department by the Executive order of June 10, 1933. The current bill carries for this activity $2,487,700. We have recommended $989,800, representing a cut of $1,497,900 below the appropriation of last year. This is due to two things: In the first place, the act known as the "George-Reed Act", bearing the names of Senators GEORGE and the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], expires this year; so there is no authority for appropriating a very large amount of money or any money to this activity.

The President, by Executive order, made a blanket reduction of 25 percent in this appropriation, and the Budget has carried that reduction forward. The committee followed the Budget. This accounts for the 25-percent reduction and the wiping out of the previous expense incurred in pursuance of the George-Reed law and accounts for the entire reduction.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. Is the appropriation for the Smith-Hughes schools proper for vocational education the same as it was last year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That break-down you will find in our hearings.

The next item refers to St. Elizabeths Insane Asylum. We adopted the Budget figure for that institution. St. Elizabeths Insane Asylum has about 5,000 insane patients, and those patients are increasing every year. There is a sort of understanding that we will appropriate so much for each person. In other words, the cost is figured at so much per head, and we appropriate money in proportion to the number of people there are in that institution. We followed practically the current law.

I come now to Howard University. For Howard University there is recommended $605,000, which is the Budget estimate. That is $487,500 less than last year. The reason for this decrease is that we appropriated $460,000 last year to Howard University for a heating plant. The Government impounded that money and did not build the heating plant. In lieu of that $460,000, however, the Public Works Administration has allowed Howard University $2,278,000, which includes funds for the heating plant. Therefore, Howard University is amply taken care of.

I believe this covers practically all of the main items of the bill. As I say, it is a Budget bill. It is an operation and maintenance bill. We have followed the cut that was made in the independent offices bill. We provide for a 10-percent reduction in salaries during the next fiscal year, the same as is recommended by the President and adopted by the House in connection with the independent offices bill. We allowed 5 percent for the next year and made a cut of 10 percent and it is on that basis.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN. This Government has seen fit to squander and dissipate millions of dollars. Thus they will create a great responsibility on the coming generations. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he feels this appropriation is large enough to prepare the youth of the coming generations for this great responsibility which we have placed on them?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman mean the white population all over the country?

Mr. ALLEN. Everyone. All of the population, the youth of the country particularly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think there are probably 125,000,000 people in the United States who would like to know that same thing. I do not feel competent to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I notice that about the only increase over last year in the Budget for the Secretary's office is that for Solicitors.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Just how does that come about? I do not know whether the gentleman explained this or not.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I explained to the House that there are 56 attorneys added to that office. Those attorneys have been taken from the Land Office, the National Parks System, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Geological Survey, and other activities. They are attorneys that have been transferred to the Solicitor's office, and that accounts for this additional appropriation under that office.

Mr. O'MALLEY. They are attorneys that have been working in the other departments.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes. They have been working in the other bureaus, but they are now under the supervision of the Solicitor.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, as the question of the advisability of the United States joining with our northern neighbor in the further development of the St. Lawrence waterway has already been interjected into the discussions here, I think it is perfectly proper that something should be said from the side of the proponents of the proposition. I doubt if there has ever been a major project before this country where there have been so many misleading statements made, statements that should only be characterized as stump speeches for the purpose of creating an unfavorable feeling against the whole project.

The difficulty has been to get the average American citizen to spend time enough to read the treaty itself and the agreement between the two countries and know exactly what it is proposed to do.

I have found many people who admit quite frankly that they had not read it; and on the other hand had been more or less impressed by headlines in the newspapers.

The average headlines in the newspapers, taken from various speeches which have been made, are to a large degree misleading. For instance, there is one that appeared in a Washington paper yesterday morning to the effect that the seaway gives Great Britain a military avenue through the United States. There is not a single particle of evidence in the treaty or the agreement that substantiates any such statement. The statements made by the gentleman from Buffalo, Mr. MEAD, that we are giving away one of the Great Lakes, that we are losing our sovereign rights; and all of those things, are not substantiated by the fact. They are just general statements to fool the people. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] said the other day in a little argument that he and I had on the floor about this proposition: "You are for it because it is in your district." I admit that charge; but in addition to that, I am for it because I think I know a little about it, and I believe it is economically sound and for the benefit of the people of this whole country.

Before I begin any special discussion one way or the other, let me lay before the House a short and simple statement of exactly what is proposed to be done in connection with this waterway. The average citizen does not seem to understand just what we propose to do.

This project provides for the joint cooperation between the United States and Canada in the development of a 27-foot seaway from Duluth to Montreal and the development of water power in the international section of the river. The distance of the international section is practically 48 miles. Each country is to pay one half of the entire cost. The water power to be developed in the international section is to be divided equally between the two countries. No allowance is to be made to either country for any work done previous to this time on the St. Lawrence River that is not directly connected up and which has helped to make the permanent 27-foot seaway. For instance, Canada for a great many years has had some 14-foot canals and they have given the United States the free use of those canals for all time. They have paid for those canals themselves and have always maintained them at their own expense. They get no credit for the canals that are in existence at the present time, excepting the Welland Canal, which is of the proper depth and which will be a part of this main seaway system.

All the money that Canada has spent below Montreal—which has been over $40,000,000—is not taken into consideration in connection with the agreement between the United States and Canada at the present time, and they get no credit whatever for that work.

Now, I first want to discuss, briefly, our national policy. As far as I konw, our national policy in connection with these matters has always been that the Federal Government is favorable to the development of the internal waterways wherever they either have commerce at the present time or where there are potential possibilities of commerce. I do not remember any Member of the House ever getting the floor here and opposing this general policy.

If this policy has been a good one in the past and the St. Lawrence seaway proposition offers as many potentialities as the most of us feel it does, are we not entitled to receive the same consideration from the Federal Government that it has given such projects in every other part of the country?

Of course, Members who are not in favor of this policy and believe that the policy of developing our inland water transportation has been entirely wrong in the past, would not agree with my position at the present time; but I am appealing here for the consideration of the people who have always adopted this policy, and as far as I know it is nearly unanimous.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman, although I would rather complete my statement first.

Mr. KVALE. Is it not true that even some of those who have resisted the development of our inland waterways might feel a little differently toward this project that promises such rich results and is on a very much larger scale?

Mr. SNELL. It would seem to me they ought to be fair in this matter, and a great many of those who have received such appropriations in the past have had much more doubtful projects than this one.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SNELL. I wish the gentleman would let me first continue my statement for a little while and then I shall be pleased to yield to anyone. I do not definitely decline to yield, but I would like to go along a little further before yielding.

I want to present just a few facts in regard to the situation, and I may say that the facts I shall present are substantiated by the treaty itself and by the hearings before the Senate committee.

In the first place, there is nothing partisan or political about this whole proposition. The last three Republican Presidents have gone definitely on record in favor of the project, and if anyone wants to see the statements I refer them to a statement made by Senator PITTMAN in his remarks on the treaty last Friday in the Senate, and, without objection, I shall insert in my remarks, again, a copy of the statements of these three Presidents.

President Harding's statement:

In our country is presented one of the world's most attractive opportunities for extension of the seaways many hundred miles inland.

The heart of the continent, with its vast resources in both agriculture and industry, would be brought in a communication with all the ocean routes by the execution of the St. Lawrence waterway project. To enable ocean-going vessels to have access to all the ports of the Great Lakes would have a most stimulating effect upon the industrial life of the continent's interior.

The feasibility of the project is unquestioned, and its cost, compared with some other great engineering works, would be small. Disorganized and prostrate, the nations of central Europe are even now setting their hands to the development of a great continental waterway which, connecting the Rhine and Danube, will bring water transportation from the Black to the North Sea, from the Mediterranean to the Baltic.

If nationalistic prejudices and economic difficulties can be overcome by Europe, they certainly should not be formidable obstacles to an achievement less expensive, and giving promise of greater advantages to the peoples of North America.

I now quote from Calvin Coolidge:

The time has come to resume in a moderate way the opening of our intracoastal waterways; the control of flood waters of the Mississippi and Colorado Rivers; the improvement of the waterways from the Great Lakes toward the Gulf of Mexico; and the development of the great power and navigation project of the St. Lawrence River, for which efforts are now being made to secure the necessary treaty with Canada.

These projects cannot all be undertaken at once, but all should have the immediate consideration of Congress and be adopted as fast as plans can be matured and the necessary funds become available.

This is not incompatible with economy, for their nature does not require so much a public expenditure as a capital investment which will be reproductive, as evinced by the marked increase in revenue from the Panama Canal. Upon these projects depends much future industrial and agricultural progress. They represent the protection of large areas from flood, and the addition of a great amount of cheap power and cheap freight by use of navigation, chief of which is the bringing of ocean-going ships to the Great Lakes.

Now let us come to the statement of President Hoover. President Hoover was undoubtedly an engineer, undoubtedly capable of understanding such questions. He said:

The signing of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty marks another step forward in this the greatest internal improvement yet undertaken on the North American Continent. * * * Its completion will have a profoundly favorable effect upon the development of agriculture and industry throughout the Midwest. The large by-product of power will benefit the Northeast * * *.

The waterway will probably require 10 years for completion, during which time normal growth of traffic in the Nation will far more than compensate for any diversions from American railways and other American port facilities. The economic gains from improved transportation have always benefited the whole people * * *.

The project is of first importance to the whole continent. The many and extremely complex engineering, legal, commercial, and international problems have been worked out by the representatives of both countries in a spirit of cooperation of which all North America can be justly proud.

In addition to this, I want to say President Hoover was unqualifiedly in favor of this development, and it does seem to me that the recommendations of a man who has had such wide experience as President Hoover has had, especially along engineering lines, should be entitled to our consideration.

Then we come to the present President of the United States. This is no new problem for President Roosevelt. During all the years he was Governor of the State of New York, this was one of our most vital problems and he has studied it from every angle; and the State of New York has spent a great deal of money in making these studies, and you have his own recommendation before you stating his position in regard to the treaty.

It has also been approved by the State Departments and the Law Departments of two administrations—President Hoover's administration and the present administration.

To show further that there is nothing partisan or political in the matter, it has been approved by the political platforms of both the Republican and Democratic National Conventions, and I supposed to a certain extent these two conventions spoke for the people. It has the approval of the Board of Army Engineers of this country as well as of Canada, who have made a most careful and complete study of the entire project, and it has never been disapproved by any definitely organized body that was set up for the purpose of making such study.

The first organized commission to study the St. Lawrence waterway was appointed by President Cleveland. They spent 2 years doing this work and reported favorably on the proposition. Next, President McKinley appointed a commission, and this commission spent 3 years and reported favorably on the project. President Wilson, realizing the importance it was to the entire country, also appointed a commission to make a study. President Harding directed the International Boundary Commission to make a study. President Coolidge appointed what is known as the "Hoover Commission" to join with a similar commission of Canada to make a detailed economic study of the proposition.

In addition to all of these studies the State of New York, through its power commission, has also made a very exhaustive examination of the entire project.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is the history of it so far as this country is concerned up to the present time. We have had at least five economic surveys made by the best-trained engineers in the United States and Canada; by some of our most distinguished citizens and best-trained minds, and there has never been an economic survey but what has reported unanimously favorably on the entire proposition.

What sense is there in the opposition coming from us at the present time, when they cannot present any definite arguments, and saying that they want an economic survey before they make up their minds? That is simply begging the question and everyone knows it. Where does this opposition come from?

It is very largely sectional and local. A great amount of it started from Albany, in my own State. The Atlantic Deep Waterway Association has been very active in opposing this proposition. I do not intend to take the time of the House to go into the various propositions that the Atlantic Deep Waterway Association have advocated in the last 15 years during my service in the House. If they have a single one in their entire list that has more favorable conditions for the transportation of commerce than the St. Lawrence River, I will apologize for any statement I make here today.

What is the situation in Albany? My friend, Peter Ten Eyck, who has been and is directly representing the Terminal Co., of the city of Albany, is the most active opponent of the whole project. Let us see what the situation is in Albany.

They came to Congress and wanted $10,000,000 to improve the Hudson River to make it a seaboard city, and I helped them to the best of my ability to get it, because I believed it would aid our entire State; and they are advertising today that it is a seaboard city.

I did not hear any man from Albany say that we ought not to do that because it would hurt the railroads, and there were double-track railroads from New York to Albany on each side of the Hudson River at that time. No one intimated at that time that Albany was taking away freight from the city of New York, and yet that is one reason they give for the large part of their opposition here—that we are taking shipping away from seaboard cities. They have never used that argument before, and of course every time you improve or make any city a seaport it naturally interferes to a certain degree with some other.

Now, there has been a concerted opposition from the Atlantic seaboard and the Mississippi Valley. I wonder if the members of the Atlantic seaboard know or stop to think that when they join with the Mississippi Valley to oppose this movement that the very next move on the part of the Mississippi Valley will be to take the freight that was going out over the St. Lawrence and take it down the Mississippi Valley. The Mississippi Valley is not interested in you, but want this freight to go over their river.

Your interests are not common in any way. As far as I know, different Members from different parts of the country heretofore have not tried to join together to destroy what appeared to be a fair economic development in the waterway system, but have been willing to let each project stand on its merits, and that is all we ask for the St. Lawrence.

And while I am talking about the Mississippi River I have tried to get the amount spent there, and I find that we have spent or intend to spend $600,000,000, and every single spring you have to make a new channel on the river, and your work is never done there on account of the great freshets.

There is one thing in favor of the St. Lawrence, and that is that when you once improve the St. Lawrence you will not have to improve it again, because there are no spring freshets on the St. Lawrence. The character of the ground and the whole channel is such that when once completed it is completed for all time, and you will not be called upon to make annual appropriations to keep it dredged.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the contributions and disbursements for the Mississippi River system already made and to be made will amount to over a billion dollars?

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman. I found in limited investigation only $600,000,000, but the amount the gentleman names is four times what we ask for on the St. Lawrence River, and you are getting a real project that not only has but always will carry commerce and does not need any Government subsidy, and there would be mighty little on the Mississippi today if it was not for the Government-operated barge lines. Opposition from this source comes with poor grace.

Let me say another word in regard to the opposition of the Atlantic seaboard. The city of Philadelphia is one of the headquarters of this opposition. As I remember it, the city of Philadelphia is 110 miles from the seaboard. That city has come on the floor of this House time and time again and has asked for improvements to make Philadelphia a seaport city. Did they at that time say that it was going to hurt the railroads? Was anybody heard saying at that time that it was going to hurt the other seaboard cities of the eastern part of the United States?

What about New Orleans? I think that is about 90 miles from the seaboard, but the Federal Government has improved each one of these seaports and made them seaport cities, but now their combined opposition is for the purpose of denying to some of us in the northern part of the United States the very advantages that they have sought and obtained from the Federal Government.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am sympathetic with the position the gentleman takes on the subject, but I am wondering what the House of Representatives has to do further with this question?

Mr. SNELL. I said at the opening of my statement that I would like to get some real facts on the subject presented to the public, and this is the only forum I know of where I can do that. If the gentleman will remember, the attack against this project was started on his side of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. In another body?

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no; in this body, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman does not anticipate any further action on our part in reference to it?

Mr. SNELL. I have tried to make it clear that I did not expect that we will ratify the treaty.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I did not mean that, but I thought it might come here in the form of appropriations.

Mr. SNELL. Certainly not until the treaty is ratified.

Mr. RANKIN. But the House would have to pass on the appropriations, would it not?

Mr. SNELL. At the present time we are not passing on very many of them. Most of the appropriations are made at the other end of the Avenue. I want to refer now specifically to the statement made by my colleague [Mr. MEAD]. He said that he made the statements because he believed that the resolutions passed by the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association were correct, and he vouched for them as far as he was concerned. Let us analyze them in detail and see whether they did present the facts to the people or not. The first of this proposition, as repeated by my colleague [Mr. MEAD] speaking of the St. Lawrence seaway, is:

> It proposes the construction of a new deep-water route, 80 percent of which lies in Canada.

Get that statement, that 80 percent of it lies in Canada. Mr. Chairman, the whole distance from Duluth to Montreal is 1,429 miles. The Welland Canal, which is entirely in Canada, is 25 miles. The section of the St. Lawrence River below the international portion, between the St. Regis Indian Reservation and Montreal, is 79 miles, or an exact total of 104 miles out of the 1,429 miles of this international seaway which will be in Canada, or less than one twelfth, instead of 80 percent as stated by the gentleman from Buffalo.

Mr. RANKIN. What percentage of it is wholly within the United States?

Mr. SNELL. Only a small proportion. Most of it is in joint waters along the international boundary.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Did you hear any opposition to the construction of the Panama Canal because that was wholly within the boundaries of a foreign country?

Mr. SNELL. I never have heard of any.

Mr. EDMONDS. I attended the meeting in Philadelphia and I want to say that the statement made that 80 percent is correct, insofar as the canals are concerned. The gentleman is referring to the waterway from Duluth to the sea.

Mr. SNELL. The entire proposition before the American people is the waterway from Duluth to Montreal.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; the proposition is to build a canal, both ends of which are in Canada.

Mr. SNELL. And that is where the gentleman is mistaken. He does not understand the proposition. It is not to build a canal, both ends of which are in Canada. If the gentleman had heard the early portion of my statement, he would know better, and now I am reading a report from the resolution as adopted in Philadelphia.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Is it not true that in the narrow bend of water at the Soo, in a canal similar to the one that is proposed to be built in the St. Lawrence seaway, there are three times as much commerce passing through it as pass through the Panama Canal?

Mr. SNELL. I think that is true. The next statement is:

> * * * propose the construction of hydroelectric power plants, 80 percent of which will reside in and belong to Canada.

What are the facts? The facts are that under the provisions of this treaty agreement we build 4 power houses, 2 on the Canadian side and 2 on the American side, which would be 50 percent in Canada and 50 percent in the United States—another absolute misstatement of fact.

The next statement is:

> To internationalize Lake Michigan, now entirely an American lake, and to surrender our sovereignty over it.

As a matter of fact, any man who has read the treaty or understands it, if he intended to present the facts to the people, never would have made that statement. To begin with, the first treaty on the use of the St. Lawrence River was in 1871. The next one was in 1909, and they refer entirely to navigation. Each country retains its own sovereignty over its own waters. To be absolutely sure and to show that I am talking by the board, let me read article VII from the treaty which deals with that proposition, and it shows distinctly that we are not giving a right to Canada that she does not have at the present time.

This is article VII of the treaty itself, so that there can not be any mistake about that:

> The high contracting parties agree that the rights of navigation accorded under the provisions of the existing treaties between the United States of America and His Majesty shall be maintained, notwithstanding the provisions of termination contained in the other treaties, and declare that these treaties confer upon the citizens and subjects and upon the ships, vessels, and boats of each of the high contracting parties the rights of navigation in the St. Lawrence River and Great Lakes system, including the canals now existing or which may be hereafter constructed.

Now, that is the actual wording of the treaty, and it distinctly provides that neither one of the contracting parties gets any rights that they do not have at the present time, and that those rights are confined to navigation. The only change is that the present treaties may be abrogated by either Government on a year's notice, and this treaty makes that part of it perpetual.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. FORD. In the judgment of the gentleman, how valid is the argument that the canal will be closed so many months in the year? How valid is that as controlling the building of the canal?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman asks me to express my opinion about the argument that the canal will be closed for a portion of the year. Of course, that is not an opinion; that is a fact, and I admit it.

Mr. FORD. How valid is it as opposing the construction of the waterway?

Mr. SNELL. The valid part depends upon the amount of freight and traffic which it will carry in the other 8 months of the year. As a matter of fact, with all of the conditions as favorable as they are at the present time, 35 percent of the shipping under the American flag is on the Great Lakes system, and the Great Lakes system is all closed 3 or 4 months per year. I cannot give the exact amount of time.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will be glad to.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the tonnage from Duluth and down the Great Lakes operates under the same handicap? That is, it only operates for 8 months in the year, but it has a greater annual tonnage than any waterway in the world?

Mr. SNELL. Absolutely. Now, I want to go a little further into the statements made by the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. EDMONDS, is in favor of and my friend Mr. MEAD is in favor of.

The statement is made, and I am quoting now:

> The United States advances in the first instance all of the costs; to allow Canada to deduct from her share of the expenses the amount of her expenditures for the waterway improvements heretofore made in Canada, and denies to the United States similar credits for practically all moneys expended in the American territory; provides that all improvements made in Canada (80 to 90 percent) shall be made by Canadian labor, Canadian materials, and Canadian engineers.

In the first place, the money is not all advanced by the United States. As a matter of cold fact, Canada has now, up to the present time, put $128,000,000 in the Welland Canal and has never charged a single cent of interest on the whole proposition, and is giving us the free use of that canal for our ships at the present time; while the United States up to this time has only spent about $14,000,000 that would be considered a part of this whole system when completed. On the other hand, keep in mind that Canada has built all of the small canals that we are using at the present time, and we have never paid one nickel toward the expense of upkeep, maintenance, or building of those canals. She certainly has been absolutely fair with us in every respect.

Just to show that the statement I am making is absolutely correct, I want to read the testimony from the Board of Army Engineers, which sets forth specifically who is going to spend the money and where, and which country is going to furnish it and the amounts. General Pillsbury was on the stand, and Senator WALSH was asking the questions:

Senator WALSH. Will you list the expenditures of the Government of the United States for each of these works?

General PILLSBURY. For the interlake channel from Lake Superior to Lake Erie, including the new lock at the Soo and United States share of compensating works, $42,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 20 additional minutes.

Mr. SNELL (continuing):

For the canal opposite the Barnharts Island, $26,000,000.

For lands and flowage in the United States, $3,000,000.

For funds furnished for the International Commission, $150,000,000.

For the amount to be used in the construction of power houses, $37,000,000.

That, with the $14,000,000 I previously referred to as already having been spent by our Federal Government, is the total amount for the Federal Government to pay, and it amounts to $272,000,000 plus. Now, here is the exact breakdown of what the Canadian Government is to do. This is also in General Pillsbury's evidence on page 329 of the hearings:

For the Welland Ship Canal, $128,000,000.

For the Thousand Islands section of the St. Lawrence River, $772,000.

For the International Rapids section, $59,250,000.

For improvements below the international border, between that section and Montreal, $82,954,000, making a total of $270,976,000.

Now, those are the actual figures of the agreement between the United States and Canada. If there is anything unfair about that or anything unreasonable, I would like to have someone tell me what it is.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Do I understand that the $128,000,000 which is included in the estimate that Canada will spend is a credit on account of the previous expenditure on the Welland Canal?

Mr. SNELL. That is a credit for the complete cost of the Welland Canal, because that is a definite part of this system, and it has a 27-foot depth.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And we get credit for the $14,000,000 that we have spent?

Mr. SNELL. That is all we have expended so far that is definitely connected with this proposition.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is the complaint of the opponents directed at that credit of $128,000,000?

Mr. SNELL. I have never been able to get it definitely so that I could find out what their complaint really is, because they never make any definite statement. It is always general, and most always not backed by the facts set forth in the treaty or agreement.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I certainly yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. MEAD. There is a very fixed, limited diversion allowed for the Chicago Drainage Canal and for such other purposes as it may be utilized. Does not the gentleman think that is a big concession to the Canadian Government? We hamstring the rivers of the United States through the adoption of this treaty. Let me say to the gentleman that the opposition in the Senate to the treaty verifies the point I make; and this opposition comes from the Mississippi River district. The very limited diversion permitted by article VIII is, in my judgment, a big concession. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion upon it.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad the gentleman brought this matter up, because I want to discuss it. In the first place, the treaty simply recognizes the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The gentleman from New York admits that. To begin with, as a matter of absolute cold fact and in accordance with the laws of every State of this Union, the people of Illinois are not entitled to take one drop of water from Lake Michigan for the canal purposes. The decisions have been uniform that water may not be taken from one watershed to another. If the gentleman remembers, the Chicago and Des Plaines Rivers originally flowed into Lake Michigan, but on account of some cute ideas of engineers and people who wanted to develop water power or canals down the State, they decided it would be a mighty nice thing to canalize the Chicago River because there was but very little drop in elevation throughout the whole length of the river. So they changed the direction of flow in this river, with the result that instead of water flowing from the river into Lake Michigan water now flows out of Lake Michigan and through the river. As a matter of cold fact, on the actual records, they are not entitled to a single drop of water because they are taking water from one watershed and putting it into another. [Applause.]

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman will agree that it is within the power of the two Governments to fix the amount of the diversion of water at Chicago, and that if it were fixed at a more liberal maximum, it would be more satisfactory.

Mr. SNELL. They are doing something that is contrary to law, but I will grant the gentleman's premise.

The treaty further provides that if there is any emergency or any real reason why they should take more water out of Lake Michigan it may be submitted to the Boundary Commission and be settled by that Commission. The treaty does not definitely state that they can never take another drop of water from Lake Michigan. As a matter of fact the people of Chicago and the State of Illinois generally ought to be tickled to death with this treaty because it recognizes a right they never have been entitled to before.

Furthermore, their contention was not with Canada, but it was with the six or seven States farther down on this waterway.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to the gentleman from New York they are not very well satisfied even though he says they should be.

Mr. SNELL. Some people would not be satisfied even though you gave them what they asked for on a gold platter.

Mr. MEAD. It seems to me these people are very reasonable in the position they take.

Mr. SNELL. I do not agree, because they are really taking something they are not entitled to take, but they are something like these people in the city of Buffalo—it is the lower end of the Lake traffic and they want to keep it for themselves; they do not want to let it go to anybody else.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the diversion permitted under the Supreme Court decision confirming the finding of Special Master Charles Evans Hughes gives them permanently 3,400 cubic second-feet diversion after 1938, whereas expert opinion is that 1,000 cubic second-feet is sufficient for navigation in the Illinois River?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is absolutely correct; and even as late as this last summer engineers have gone over the whole proposition. The engineers are unanimous in their opinion that there is ample diversion permitted to take care of this waterway.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. One reason the people of Chicago are against this waterway is because they have not taken some of the money they have otherwise wasted to build sewage-disposal plants similar to those that have been built in my city of Milwaukee, and they are trying to wash their sewage down the Mississippi with Lake Michigan water.

Mr. SNELL. That is true. Another reason is because they want to develop water power farther down in the State of Illinois, and they are taking this water from Lake Michigan, which they have no right to do.

Mr. MEAD. I think the gentleman will agree that this limitation is fixed as far as Lake Michigan is concerned, but is not fixed so far as Georgian Bay is concerned.

Mr. SNELL. I do not admit any such thing, because it is not so, I may say to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. We are internationalizing our lake, but they are not internationalizing theirs.

Mr. SNELL. We are not internationalizing these lakes. If the gentleman would read the treaty, he would not make such an observation.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman has read the treaty, and in my judgment, the gentleman from New York is mistaken in his interpretation of it.

Mr. SNELL. It is not internationalized, because the treaty simply carries out other treaties in existence at the present time, and the gentleman said in his speech the other day he wanted it left as it is, and we are doing so under the treaty.

Mr. MEAD. Yes; but I may say to the gentleman that if we adopt this treaty, we make permanent agreements which under existing treaties may be modified or terminated from time to time.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; that is true, and that is what we want.

Mr. MEAD. So we lose the bargaining power to deal with the Canadian Government when we make permanent what now is temporary. When former Secretary of State Elihu Root appeared before the Senate committee he vigorously opposed the internationalization of Lake Michigan.

Mr. SNELL. I am just as much opposed to internationalizing Lake Michigan as is the gentleman from New York, but there is not a single word in this whole treaty which substantiates that position, and if the gentleman has read the treaty as he says he has, he ought to know it. So far as the diversion of water from some other part of the system is concerned, it is definitely taken care of in section (b) of article VIII of the treaty—and I call the gentleman's attention to it—

No diversions of water other than that diversion referred to in paragraph (a)—

That is, the Chicago diversion—of this article from the Great Lakes system or from the international section to another watershed shall hereafter be made except by authorization of the International Joint Commission.

This definitely provides that Canada cannot take any water out of this system any more than we can, yet they do give us the right to take out some water at Chicago.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question or two with reference to the power-development phase of this project. I may say to the gentleman from New York that I join him in supporting the President on this treaty.

Mr. SNELL. That is one thing we are together on.

Mr. RANKIN. That is one thing we are together on; yes. Can the gentleman tell us how much electric power it is expected will be developed?

Mr. SNELL. In the international section, which is the only section to which this treaty pertains, there will be developed 2,200,000 horsepower of electrical energy of which 1,100,000 horsepower will go to Canada and 1,100,000 to the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. I wonder if the gentleman can give me an idea of the difference between power rates to the ultimate consumer at the present time in the State of New York and in the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. SNELL. I cannot give the gentleman definite information. That gets into another subject. I have taken so much time now that I do not want to infringe on the time of the House. I cannot give the gentleman the definite information he asks for.

Mr. RANKIN. I have had occasion to look into that matter, and in the majority of towns given in what they call NELA—the National Electric Light Association publication—I find that the electric light and power rates to the ultimate consumer in cities in New York and other States in that latitude are around three to four times what they are in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. SNELL. There is no doubt that this development, and whatever electric power is generated, will be to the advantage of all people within a radius of three or four hundred miles of the development, and they will get cheaper rates.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman spoke of the position taken by the Atlantic Seaboard Transportation outfit. I want to ask the gentleman if he has appreciably recognized the opposition of the power interests to the treaty?

Mr. SNELL. They are probably opposed to it, but I do not know for sure. The railroads are very bitterly opposed to this treaty, as I understand. I do not know definately about the utilities.

Mr. RANKIN. The power interests throughout the country are opposing any power development on the part of the United States that will give the American people cheap lights and power, just as they did the Muscle Shoals development.

Mr. SNELL. I do not want to get into that proposition, because I have sufficient trouble here with this proposition.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman touched on the question of what steamers the opening of this seaway might invite to the Great Lakes sections.

Mr. SNELL. Eighty to 85 percent of all the ships afloat could get into the interior of this country if this seaway were opened.

Mr. DONDERO. Eighty to 85 percent of the ships of the world?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think now the question has been reached that is of importance. Will the ships of the world use the waterway?

Mr. SNELL. I cannot answer that question and I do not believe the gentleman can, but the evidence before the Senate committee said "yes."

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the whole point.

Mr. SNELL. I do know this. Originally we had tugboats towing barges on the St. Lawrence River, and, as Canada improved the canals on the north side of the river, these were supplanted by wooden steamboats of larger size. Then Canada developed their canal system to get 14 feet of water in the canals, and the wooden steamboats were superseded by steel steamships that go to every part of the world. From present indications the traffic has followed the improvement of the St. Lawrence River. What will happen in the future I cannot tell the gentleman, but I believe the experience will be the same in the future as in the past, because it really is the greatest river on the American Continent. There is water in it and there is unlimited opportunity for transportation facilities to be developed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was not the object of my inquiry, if the gentleman will be patient with me.

Mr. SNELL. I will try to be patient with the gentleman.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I asked the gentleman if he thought the shipping of the world would use this waterway. There is a reason for my inquiry. In the first place, the ships that use this waterway must be ocean-going vessels. This is conceded, of course.

Mr. SNELL. They can be ocean-going vessels, but they are not obliged to be.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They have to be ocean-going vessels if the waterway is going to be useful in carrying cargo from Duluth to London.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And an ocean-going vessel has to be built much heavier than a lake vessel; is not that correct?

Mr. SNELL. I understand so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. She has to have heavier engines, greater bunker capacity, more auxiliary machinery, and a larger crew. Her overhead is at least twice that of a lake vessel, which is more lightly built, because the lake vessel does not have to be constructed as heavily as the ocean-going vessel.

I have spoken to shipping men who do not care where their ships go as long as they make money. They do not care whether their ships go to New York, Baltimore, Chicago, or Duluth, provided the ships can be operated profitably. These shipping men have told me that you cannot take an ocean-going cargo vessel, which must be operated at 10 knots an hour on the average in order to make any money, through a series of locks and canals, reducing her speed to 4 knots an hour, and absorb the overhead. I am speaking now of the ocean-going vessel, which the gentleman is so confident will go through these locks and these canals and over the smooth waters of the Lakes to the interior Lake harbors. Add to that the fact that navigation up here is only open 6½ or 7 months in the year——

Mr. SNELL. But it is open for over 8 months, and that is a matter of record.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is that going to tempt the heavily constructed and more expensive ocean-going vessel?

Mr. SNELL. I want to be fair with the gentleman. I cannot tell the gentleman definitely whether that will be true or not, but the best informed shipping expert I know of, Mr. Robert Dollar, says yes. However, if the statement you make is true and they will not use this waterway, it will not hurt any of the eastern seaports or the people of the Mississippi Valley who are so bitterly opposed to the spending of this money at the present time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What becomes of the money? Do we not care about the money?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; we do care about the money, but we have authorized $40,000,000 already and with the amount we have authorized and expended and the returns that will come to us from New York State, we would only have to put up $132,000,000 more in order to have a completed project and have the finest waterway on the American Continent, and one that every commission that has ever made a complete study of it, says is economically sound.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, we get the electric power out of the expenditure of the money even if they do not use the canal.

Mr. DONDERO. May I say, in answering the gentleman's statement, that the total loss of time between all the locks from Lake Superior to the Atlantic Ocean is 12 hours. Is it not a fact that the ships of the world will go wherever there is cargo?

Mr. SNELL. I always supposed they would, and that is the testimony before the Senate committee.

Mr. COLE. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. COLE. Am I right in assuming that in all waterway improvements which this Congress passed upon, the question of potential tonnage is always a serious consideration and a matter of factual consideration?

Mr. SNELL. It always has been since I have been a Member of the House. This has been a policy of the American Government.

Mr. COLE. The gentleman has not answered the question as to the potential tonnage which this waterway might bring.

Mr. SNELL. We have potential tonnage estimates all the way from 20 to 30 million tons. At the present time I think it is about six or seven million tons.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Is it not a fact that the future tonnage, as estimated by the engineers and by experts who have examined into these questions, including various commissions that have been appointed, has been set at some 30,000,000 tons per year?

Mr. SNELL. It has been estimated at all the way from 20 to 30 million tons.

Mr. CULKIN. Has it not been affirmatively stated by experts on such questions that seagoing vessels will use this waterway?

Mr. SNELL. That is the testimony before the committee. Whether it is right or not, I do not know. Of course, I think it is as good as the testimony of the average man who has never had anything to do with the shipping business.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 20 additional minutes.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. I simply want to make this comment, in answer to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]: We have industries in the city of Detroit, in my district, that are now shipping their products to China by water in spite of the limited facilities they have at present.

Mr. SNELL. That is a pretty good answer.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SNELL. I shall have to yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman has indicated my interest in Buffalo, and I believe he will admit his in Ogdensburg.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman had been here when I started my statement, he would have known that I admitted that to the House.

Mr. MEAD. And our other colleague from New York will admit his interest in Oswego, and I should like to have the gentleman, in the course of his remarks, tell the House what effect the construction of this waterway will have on our Atlantic seaports from Portsmouth, N.H., to Charleston, S.C., and particularly its effect on the port of New York.

Mr. SNELL. In my honest judgment, if this country is going to go along and develop in the next 10 years as we expect it to develop, under the new deal which the gentleman is now supporting [laughter], and we are going to have good times right away, the increased shipping from that section of the country which will be developed by the improvement of this waterway will more than make up for anything that is taken from the Atlantic seaboard. As a matter of cold fact, when we develop any one of these harbors, we have never before considered it from the standpoint of whether it would hurt any other harbor or not, but whether it was a reasonable, sensible, and sound proposition in itself. [Applause.] I simply ask that you give us the same treatment that we have given, for instance, in the expenditure of $8,000,000 on the Buffalo Harbor, as well as on the harbors in other parts of the United States.

Mr. MEAD. But the gentleman will agree with me that we ought to consider its effect on the entire country.

Mr. SNELL. I want that to be considered and that is why I am advocating this project, because it vitally affects the welfare of 40,000,000 people and favorably affects the whole country.

Mr. MEAD. Including the interests of the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. SNELL. I am asking you to consider the general improvement and development of the entire United States. This improvement specially affects the prosperity and wealth and happiness of 40,000,000 people. You have not another proposition in the whole book that is anywhere near as national as this one.

Mr. MEAD. I agree it affects them, but it affects them adversely.

Mr. BEITER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. BEITER. Considering there has been $8,000,000 spent on the Buffalo Harbor, if sea-going vessels are to be permitted to go into Buffalo Harbor, an additional $25,000,000 would have to be spent there in order to deepen that harbor?

Mr. SNELL. That is not so, for General Markham testified he could improve any of these harbors for about $7,500,000 each.

Mr. BEITER. That would mean seven and a half million dollars on each harbor?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BEITER. That would cost the United States that much additional money for each harbor.

Mr. SNELL. And most of you men who are opposed to this say they are not going to have any shipping, so you will not want them deepened. [Laughter.]

Now, let me get down to the cost of this canal.

The opponents of this proposition have spread a great deal of information or misinformation throughout the country to the effect that the canal cannot be built under the estimates. The estimates were made by the Board of Army Engineers on the 1926 basis, and there is a definite statement by General Markham, the Chief of the Board of Army Engineers, that he not only can do this work at the present time for the amount of the estimate put in originally but there is enough to spare to cover all interest costs or any other emergencies that might arise, and, as a matter of fact, in none of the developments that the Federal Government has made in any part of the country have we ever taken into consideration interest costs.

Further, the Federal Government, as a matter of fact, is going to build the Boulder Dam for less than the Army estimates, and this is the latest major development that has been undertaken by the Corps of Army Engineers. At the present time they are letting contracts up in the Soo district for around 50 percent of the estimates, and there is a definite statement in the hearings by both General Pillsbury and General Markham that there is no question but what this project can be completed for less than the estimated cost.

The opponents are talking about estimates that have been made by outside engineers and they refer specifically to one made by Col. Hugh Cooper. I may say to you that the estimate made by Col. Hugh Cooper some years ago—I think it was in 1920—was not based on the project which is under consideration at the present time. It was based on a complete development of the entire proposition and a development of approximately 5,000,000 horsepower. A telegram from Colonel Cooper, which was put in the RECORD yesterday by Senator VANDENBERG, explains this.

Mr. BEITER. Does the gentleman believe then it is wise to spend only a part of this money and not carry the project on to completion?

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, the other part of the project is entirely in Canadian territory and we have nothing to do with it, and I have spent an hour here trying to make you believe I am in favor of the project.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Do I understand that Col. Hugh L. Cooper, who is quite an authority on these matters, is unqualifiedly in favor of this canal?

Mr. SNELL. Not only unqualifiedly in favor of it but if you will give him the opportunity, as further proof of whether it is economically sound or not, he will get an organization together within 6 months and give the United States the navigation rights if we will just let him have the power. This is definite proof of whether it is advisable to spend the money or not.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Colonel Cooper's opinion ought to count for something; and I also understand the Army Engineers are in favor of this development?

Mr. SNELL. Absolutely; and every economic survey that has been made has endorsed it.

If you can find a single thing that is unfair to our people or to our Government, when you consider that we have 125,000,000 population as against 10,000,000, and you consider all the developments, industrial and agricultural along the tributaries and the Great Lakes system, when the Canadian people agree to pay half the entire cost—if there is anything unfair about it I am unable to find it.

Now, I had several other things that I wished to bring up but I have taken so much time I am not going to discuss it further. I want to say in conclusion that every step in the treaty and agreement and the engineering problems, the commercial value, the international relations have been worked out by the best-trained minds in both countries. It has been done with a mutual cooperation that has never been surpassed in any international relations.

Now, let me say that Canada has started out to do this work and she will finish it alone if we do not cooperate. And when she does do that American shipping will pay tolls to go through the canal and you will have a continual yoke about the necks of the people who live in the great empire of the United States.

If you do not accept this opportunity now you will never have it again. It is impossible to get to the sea by the St. Lawrence River unless we cooperate with Canada. We cannot go there in any other way, and Canada can do it alone and by itself, and a great many people think they intend to do it at a very early date.

Mr. BEITER. What has the gentleman to say about the all-American canal?

Mr. SNELL. We are not discussing that, and, in fact, I do not know where it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 5 minutes more.

Mr. LAMBERTON. I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. May I inquire of the gentleman what route he is in favor of?

Mr. BEITER. I am in favor of the route by Buffalo.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is Mr. Dempsey, who was formerly chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in favor of this St. Lawrence project?

Mr. SNELL. No; he is opposed to it. He comes from Buffalo, the same as the gentleman from New York, Mr. MEAD.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I think I can answer the proposition by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I have in my hand a statement made by Robert Dollar, one of the greatest shipowners in the world. And it reads as follows:

> You ask whether ocean-going ships would be willing to go to the upper Lakes for cargo. I can answer you without fear of contradiction by saying that ships will certainly go to the Lakes for cargo, in fact, ships will go anywhere and everywhere to get cargoes. We have big ocean-going steamers running 1,000 miles up the Yangtze River where the current is very swift and navigation quite difficult, far more difficult than it would be going to Lake Superior from Montreal.
> Bulk cargoes would be available on the Lakes, especially on Lake Superior, and of the kind that would attract shipping. There is no question but that full cargoes of general merchandise would also be obtained going inward.
> The draft of water necessary for the ordinary steamer today is about 25 feet, some require more than this, but the majority of steamers run from 25 to 26 feet.

Mr. SNELL. I think that is a good statement and comes from a source recognized as authority in shipping services in this country. Someone has said that a great amount of the work in the international section is on the Canadian side. I have here a survey of the whole proposition which anyone can look at, and it shows that the major part of the stream in the international section is on the south side of the international section line. The Barnhart Isle Dam, which is the larger dam of the two, is two thirds on American territory.

I want to stress to you that when this work is concluded each Government maintains all of the property that is on its respective territory. No complications will arise from that source. I am honestly of the opinion that it is a good, clean, straight agreement between two nations, and it will further cement the friendly relations between our neighbors on the north and ourselves, and from any study that I have been able to give it—and I admit that I have spent some time looking it up—I fail to see one honest, intelligent reason why we should not join with Canada in concluding the treaty and making this development, which is the largest single development on the American Continent, in a river that has potentialities of more commerce than any river in the United States or in the entire North American Continent. I thank you for the time given me. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, this bill, as its name indicates, makes appropriations for the Interior Department and all of the activities conducted under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. It is the second supply bill to be considered by Congress during the present session.

Our very able and distinguished chairman [Mr. TAYLOR] has analyzed in great detail the appropriations for the various Bureaus, and it will not be necessary to repeat what he has so well said. For myself and the chairman, we welcome the three new members of our subcommittee, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. JACOBSEN], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER]. They are valuable additions to the committee, and rendered constructive and helpful service.

The total amount recommended in this bill for the 1935 fiscal year is $31,098,504, which is $110,952 less than the Budget estimates and $19,380,767.67 less than was appropriated for 1934.

For the office of the Secretary the bill carries $1,165,285, being $10,000 less than the Budget estimates. This reduction is in the Division of Investigations.

The Board of Indian Commissioners was abolished by order of the President.

The Commission of Fine Arts is a new activity transferred to this bill from the independent offices appropriation bill, and carries the Budget estimates of $8,780 for salaries and $300 for printing. It is an independent Commission. The seven members of the Commission serve without salary and are appointed from among the members of the leading artistic professions.

For the Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission the unexpended balance, estimated at $49,000, is reappropriated. The total amount authorized to be appropriated for this Commission is $250,000, to be expended only when matched in an equal amount from other funds. In all, $195,000 has been appropriated.

The George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission was transferred to the Interior Department June 10, 1933. Only the unexpended balance of $50,000 is reappropriated. This amount is expected to complete the work of the Commission.

For the General Land Office there is recommended $788,000, as against $778,000 for the current year. The committee deducted $5,000 from salaries and added $15,000 for the printing of large maps.

BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

The Indians in the United States were placed under the control and supervision of the War Department when that Department was created by the act of Congress of August 7, 1789. The Bureau of Indian Affairs was organized in the War Department March 11, 1824, and Thomas L. McKenney was placed in charge. The Office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs was created by act of Congress of July 9, 1832, and was transferred to the Department of the Interior when that Department was created by the act of Congress of March 3, 1849.

Before 1871 it was the policy of the Government to make treaties with the Indians. Subsequent to that time and up until approximately 25 years ago, agreements were made with them. Within the last quarter of a century Congress has assumed the responsibility of legislating direct for the benefit of the Indians. The courts have held, in certain far-reaching decisions, that Congress has authority to enact such legislation.

It is estimated by the Bureau of Indian Affairs that there are approximately 240,000 restricted Indians in the United States under some kind of Government supervision. There are a great many Indians who are not enrolled on any Indian rolls, because they were born subsequent to the closing of their tribal rolls. The allotment of Indian lands began under the act of Congress of 1887 and has continued down to the present time. To illustrate, allotments were made to members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, and for that purpose 101,798 members were enrolled. These allotments were made under agreements and acts of Congress entered into in 1897, amended from time to time, but the allotments were completed about 25 years ago. The rolls of the Five Civilized Tribes were made as of the date of March 4, 1906, and since that time those children born to allotted Indians in these tribes were and are not carried on the rolls. This is in a measure true of most of the Indian tribes.

The records of the Bureau of Indian Affairs show there are 110 separate Indian jurisdictions. There are some differences in the treaties or laws governing each tribe. The Indians speak more than 50 different languages.

It is often asked why more money is appropriated for the Indian Service now than was necessary years ago. The answer is that at that time the Indians lived on larger reservations and were dealt with as tribes and not as individuals. Within the last 40 years the Government has changed its policy through efforts to induce the Indians to allot their lands in severalty, so that the Government now deals with the Indians as individuals rather than as tribes.

For the Bureau of Indian Affairs there is recommended to be appropriated, exclusive of tribal funds, $16,269,010, or $16,380 less than the Budget estimates, and in addition there is appropriated $1,414,915 from tribal funds. Of the funds appropriated by the Government from the Federal Treasury, $14,631,255 are gratuity appropriations, $796,125 reimbursable, and $841,630 treaty appropriations.

For the Office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in Washington $333,900 is appropriated; for industrial assistance, $1,060,510; for water supply, $52,810; for irrigation and drainage, $397,855; and for education, $7,990,565. The appropriation for education is for the support of 28 reservation and 26 nonreservation schools and for Indian day schools and for the payment of tuition of Indian children attending public schools in the various States.

The Bureau reports 50,171 Indian children attending public schools and 14,786 Indian children attending Indian day and boarding schools. The Bureau is making every effort to enlarge the day and Indian school service and to reduce the number attending boarding schools.

In my judgment, the Indian day schools can be made a success among those Indian tribes where the Indians live in groups and where the Bureau provides books and clothing and hot lunches where necessary, but that more difficulty will be experienced where the Indians live in sparsely settled communities. To illustrate, the Hopi Indians live in villages, and the Pueblos for the most part, and the same is true as to other Indian tribes. The population in some communities is largely Indian, where Indian day schools can be established for the attendance of the Indian children.

However, we must remember that lands have been allotted commencing subsequent to the act of Congress of 1887, and in many cases the Indian-owned lands are widely scattered, so that in some school districts there will be found but few Indian families. Many of these Indians are poor and unable to buy books, clothing, or food for their children. This is true in many sections of Oklahoma. From the standpoint of administration it is impracticable to attempt to get the full-blood Indian children in these sparsely settled communities to attend the public schools. In certain sections where the Indians live in communities it is practical to establish Indian day schools and to provide books, clothing, and hot lunches for the children. To meet this situation in Oklahoma and elsewhere where similar conditions prevail, the Indian boarding schools must be continued. With reference to the Navajo Indians in Arizona, the raising of sheep is the principal industry. They have a large area of unallotted land. They have their herds of sheep and do not live permanently in one place. The Indian families, in wagons, follow for great distances and watch their herds. I greatly fear the Indian Bureau will experience difficulty in securing regular attendance of these Indian children.

For my part, I think for the present that it is a mistake to close any of the boarding schools or not to use their full capacity until more Indians receive industrial training and are able to compete with their white neighbors. It is urged that Indian children will carry their training back home to the benefit of their parents. This is true if they attend, but suppose, for lack of funds to buy books, clothing, and food, they do not attend school?

There are many Indians, with families, born since the tribal lands were allotted, who have no land and no homes, and if boarding schools are closed to them, they will have no educational advantages.

I have attended the Indian tribal schools and their boarding schools and later taught in some of them. I have tried to think their thoughts and dream their dreams. We cannot afford to make a mistake that will retard the advancement of our Indian wards, to their detriment. The allotment of lands has been pressed upon them. They should be guided and directed and their children given the opportunity of industrial training in boarding schools a little while longer until they are able to appreciate fully their property interests and know how to protect themselves against improvident contracts. I hesitate to disagree with the policy of the Indian Bureau in this respect, but feel so keenly my responsibility that I feel compelled to state here, in substance, what I stated in the hearings, that I think it is a mistake to discontinue, at the present time, any of the boarding schools and not use them to their capacity.

There are additional appropriations for the Indian Bureau, including industrial assistance and funds to meet treaty obligations and the sum of $2,981,040 for conservation of health. This last is a very important item and is spent largely in the maintenance of hospitals built for the benefit of Indians throughout the country.

The Indians within the last few years are being induced to enter hospitals for treatment, and their prejudice against being treated by white physicians has been largely overcome.

The act of Congress of March 2, 1933, provided that there should be submitted to Congress an alternative arrangement in the estimates for the Indian Service. An alternative budget was submitted which received the most careful consideration of the committee, but it was not adopted. An alternative budget means a lump-sum appropriation. The committee believes that these appropriations can be watched much more closely if they are made in greater detail. Justifications will have to be presented and each succeeding Congress will take greater care in looking after the expenditures of the funds. It was pressed upon the committee's attention with great earnestness that the alternative budget method would simplify bookkeeping, but it was not insisted that it would reduce expenditures.

Under the alternative budget arrangement a lump sum would be appropriated and the break-down in the estimates would show for what purpose the money was to be expended. Personally, I do not favor lump-sum appropriations. Years ago Congress appropriated in greater detail than now. Lump-sum appropriations lead to extravagance and give too much power to bureaus and heads of divisions. Congress in the end loses control over the money appropriated. Too much care cannot be exercised in watching the items in the appropriation bills. Let me repeat, an alternative budget is synonymous with lump-sum appropriations. Let nobody be deceived. That is exactly what it amounts to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman follow that plan avoiding lump-sum appropriations throughout the entire bill?

Mr. HASTINGS. We do. The committee followed the plan of last year and did not accept the alternate budget plan.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. TERRELL of Texas. Did the committee have before it the amount of receipts from the various parks, to see whether they had sufficient receipts to take care of the appropriation necessary for their maintenance?

Mr. HASTINGS. They are not self-sustaining at any park. The gentleman is speaking of receipts for admission and concessions at the national parks. Some of the parks are almost self-sustaining, some do not make charges, but in no case is there a sufficient amount of revenue derived to pay all the expenses of the park.

If you will turn to the bill as reported you will find we appropriated for the nonreservation boarding schools in detail. They are all set out in the appropriation bill. The capacity of each school is estimated and appropriated for, where there are 200 pupils or less, on the basis of $325 per year. Where there are between 200 and 500, $295 per year, and where the number in attendance is more than 500, we appropriated on the basis of $280 with an additional $50 for those in attendance above the sixth grade; but under the alternate arrangement, a lump sum for all these schools, without appropriating for them separately. That is the difference between the present method and the lump-sum plan proposed.

Mr. MARLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. MARLAND. Will the gentleman inform me whether the appropriation for the Chilocco School has been reduced this year?

Mr. HASTINGS. It has. Let me explain that last year we appropriated for 850 Indian children at Chilocco. The Bureau of Indian Affairs, under its present policy of reducing the capacity of boarding schools, asked the Bureau of the Budget for an estimate for only 650 children. The committee allowed the full Budget estimate and all that was requested by the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MARLAND. The gentleman is aware that Chilocco School is the largest agricultural school in the country for Indians. In my district and over all Oklahoma we have many Indians with allotments of land. Is it not the opinion of the gentleman that the best education we could give to the children of those Indian allotments is an agricultural education?

Mr. HASTINGS. I heartily agree with my colleague. I do not think their capacity should be reduced.

Mr. MARLAND. Then I should like to know why the number of pupils which can be taken care of in that great agricultural school has been reduced?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I explained a moment ago that there are reservation and nonreservation boarding schools. Then we have what is known as the "Indian day schools." Those are schools on Indian reservations that are attended exclusively by Indian children; and from this appropriation we pay tuition for the attendance of Indian children in the public schools throughout the western States. My colleague, of course, knows, in Oklahoma we appropriate $394,000 for the payment of tuition for Indian children who attend the public schools. The present Commissioner of Indian Affairs is changing the policy and believes in stressing the attendance of children either in Indian day schools or in public schools and believes in reducing the attendance of pupils in the boarding schools. I repeat that I do not agree with this policy of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but the Indian Bureau presented these figures to the Bureau of the Budget and the committee has followed the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget as to each of these schools.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I should be glad to yield, but my time has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman think the Indian should be compelled to bear any part of the cost of administering the Indian Bureau? I was told this morning that the salaries of the men were not in any event paid out of Indian funds.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is mistaken. The expenses of the Indian Bureau are provided for from gratuity appropriations from the Federal Treasury, although there may be some small amounts for determining heirs, or something of that kind, charged to the Indian.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I was given that information this morning upon inquiry; but the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, on the other hand, tells me that whereas there are about 250 employees in the Indian Bureau in Washington there are some 6,000 scattered throughout the different agencies.

Mr. HASTINGS. Six thousand three hundred and thirty-three, including Alaska.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. And the salaries of these men and the expenses of maintaining their functions have been paid out of Indian funds until the Indian funds have become exhausted.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thought the gentleman was inquiring about the salaries of employees in Washington.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman means those in the field, it depends upon whether the particular tribe of Indians has any large funds to its credit. The Osage Indians in Oklahoma used to be the wealthiest of all the Indians in the United States. Their individual incomes used to be around $13,000 a year. Their tribal expenses are paid out of the Osage tribal funds. The employees administer, protect, and develop their property, including their oil and gas rights held in common. This is true as to a few other tribes. Their money is used to protect their property.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Is there any reason why the governmental activities related to the affairs of the Indians should be paid out of their own funds when we white men are governed by a people who are totally and entirely paid out of public funds?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not think the gentleman from Minnesota fully understands the situation.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If the Indian has property or derives an income, he pays taxes, does he not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Generally speaking, no; and most of this money is used to supervise the property of the Indians, to make it more valuable. It is upon this theory Indian funds are appropriated.

For the Bureau of Reclamation there is recommended in this bill $860,750, or $2,000 less than the Budget estimates, and this amount is deducted from the $307,000 estimated for the New Mexico-Texas-Rio Grande project, reducing it to the amount carried for 1934. No new projects are authorized. Only two large projects in course of construction are provided for: For the New Mexico-Texas-Rio Grande $305,000 is recommended, and $246,400 is recommended for the Yakima project. Both are under construction. The remainder is for operation and maintenance. Nothing is carried in the bill for the Boulder Dam project, for the reason that $38,000,000 has been allocated to this project from the public-works fund.

For the Geological Survey there is recommended $1,303,060, which is $19,130 less than the Budget estimates. Of this amount, $7,500 was taken from the classification of lands and $11,630 from printing and binding.

For national parks, buildings, and reservations the bill carries the Budget estimates less $54,000 taken from public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, and carries a total of $6,319,640. No new construction is provided for.

For the Office of Education the committee allowed the Budget estimates of $233,000, and for vocational education, $1,222,800.

For Alaska, $716,200 is carried in the bill, a reduction of $16,740 from the item to care for the insane, reducing it to $161,600, the same amount carried for the current year.

For Hawaii the Budget estimate of $62,210 is recommended.

For the Virgin Islands the committee recommended $1,113,168, reducing the Budget estimates by $2,702.

For St. Elizabeths Hospital the Budget estimates are $1,064,961, the same being the amount carried for the current year, which amount was allowed.

For Columbia Institute for the Deaf the Budget estimate of $119,600 is recommended.

For Howard University the committee recommends the sum of $605,000. There was an allotment from the public works fund of $2,294,311 for Howard University.

For the Freedmen's Hospital the committee recommended the Budget estimates of $258,150, which is $17,980 less than was appropriated for the current year.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the minority Members I feel it is in order to express to the distinguished gentleman from Colorado and his associates, our appreciation for the courtesies which were accorded to us during the hearings and during the consideration of the bill. We on the minority side received every courtesy possible. I feel that the majority should know the degree of attention, the study, the knowledge that the group on the majority side have given the diversified subjects contained in this Interior Department appropriation measure.

In no sense attempting undue flattery, I believe I can say on behalf of the minority members, of the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] that nobody in the House knows Indian Affairs better than he; and we of the minority place absolute confidence in his judgment, in the suggestions he makes, in the recommendations he makes; and I think the House should accept them.

Again, so far as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is concerned, I know that throughout the years he has made a careful study of these projects which are a part of the bill now before us for consideration, and that his study has resulted in an intimate knowledge which he freely gave the minority group as we worked on the bill.

I was rather interested in the chairman's presentation this morning of the general outline of the bill. I was rather interested in the adroit way in which he emphasized the remarkable degree of savings, the cuts, that had been made in the present appropriation measure; the way in which he emphasized that there had been considerable reductions; the efforts that he put forth to bring to the Membership of the House the spirit of economy that he supposed prevailed.

On the other hand, I was interested also in the rather superfluous way he dealt with, and the careful cunning he used in dealing with the tremendous amounts of money that are coming from two other sources for projects which ordinarily are cared for by appropriations provided by this subcommittee. Very deftly did he gloss over the sum of $197,000,000; and in answer to an inquiry directed by one of the gentlemen from the Republican side of the House, he satisfied his own conscience apparently and attempted to satisfy the inquiry of the committee when he said: "That is none of our business." I say I believe it is some of our business. It may not be the direct business of this Appropriations Committee; it may not be the business of the subcommittee considering the Interior Department bill; but I do believe it is the business of every Member of this House; and I believe it is our definite duty to know something about where the $197,000,000 of the money of the taxpayers is going. We cannot satisfy our own conscience, and we cannot satisfy the inquiry of the committee, by simply saying that it is a matter we have delegated to somebody else. My colleague and I have the highest regard for Mr. TAYLOR. As the chairman of the subcommittee, he told us that we are operating on a $31,000,000 base as compared to a $50,000,000 base of last year. That $19,000,000 he held before you this morning as really an accomplishment, something worth while; but let us add the $31,000,000 and the $197,000,000 and let us show that it is $228,000,000 as the program of expenditure, four times the expenditure we had last year.

Let us look at a few of those allotments from P.W.A. and C.W.A. The distinguished chairman told you that it was a program to provide work, and, speaking for myself—and I believe speaking for the minority group as a whole—I am in sympathy with that which provides a spread of real employment. But do the figures and facts as produced at the hearing carry out this feature of widespread employment?

May I direct attention to one item. You will find this in the break-down on page 6 of the hearings. I direct attention to the fact that the Geological Survey is the recipient of the bounty of the Civil Works and the Public Works groups to the extent of $4,759,954. The hearings developed this rather interesting fact, that of that sum appropriated for 1934–35, $2,311,500 is to be used for topographic surveys. I have no complaint with topographic surveys. I find no objection to their worthwhileness, but I do question the propriety of the excuse that this money is being used for the employment of groups of people, when I discover that in answer to a question on page 140 of the hearings we were told that this topographic survey and this $2,000,000 provides employment largely for the engineering profession. I am not opposed to the engineering profession. I recognize the contributions which that profession has brought and is bringing in our scheme of life, but I do ask the question whether $2,000,000 distributed largely for the engineering profession gives the greatest possible spread of employment among the largest group of individual workers in this country of ours.

Mr. DITTER. I yield myself 5 additional minutes. It occurs to me that that two-million-odd dollars, if left to the discretion of this House to appropriate and measure out, might be used for other purposes than purely the engineering group.

Mr. FADDIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FADDIS. To what class of employment does the gentleman think the money appropriated for the Geological Survey should go—day labor?

Mr. DITTER. I question the propriety of the use of that sum for the Geological Survey. In other words, my answer to the gentleman is that I believe that is a stupendous sum of money when we consider the serious question that was raised in the House last week with regard to the rights of the veterans and the rights of the civil employees. I say that that is a sizable sum of money, and rather than having that handed out in one lump sum, the Membership of this House, in the ordinary methods of appropriation, should have the disposition of this money in its hands.

Bear with me. I am not approaching this in any sense in a partisanship way. I believe I could make the same appeal and use the words of the distinguished chairman of our committee when he told you this morning that he was opposed to lump-sum appropriations. He has stated repeatedly—and I feel I breach no confidence when I make the declaration—that he believed these projects should come before the committee and their merit and worthwhileness should be shown to us in order to warrant the expenditure of funds.

I could go on into the Reclamation Service for which there is appropriated $102,000,000. If you break down the information given to you on page 6, you will find that in every instance it represents sizable sums of money appropriated by one single instrumentality to which this Congress has delegated the duty to spend money.

I point out to you another factor in connection with the issue I am trying to raise. We cannot be unmindful of the fact that while these sums may be appropriated for Civil Works and Public Works construction today and this year, the construction of those projects definitely entails a future liability of maintenance in years to come. They may allot so many thousand dollars for this project today through Public Works and so many thousands for another, but in each instance there is entailed a certain degree of future maintenance and cost, which you and I must pass on.

May I point out to you another feature in connection with the same item. I know there have been projects before the House in times past seeking appropriations and these appropriations have been denied by the House, because the committee that might have the particular project under its care and scrutiny felt it was not a warrantable and a worthwhile project. You refused to endorse and countenance the expenditure for that purpose, and now by action that is apparently the order of the day here, we are completely deprived of such right of supervision, such right of scrutiny, such right of examination, and the entire question of the propriety of the project is handed over, lock, stock, and barrel, to another agency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DITTER. Again, in order to be in line with my predecessors, who seemed warranted in taking additional time, I yield myself 3 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

May I urge upon you my own sense of responsibility? I believe that the Public Works and the Civil Works are making honest efforts in the allotment of the funds, but I also believe that these facts should be brought to the attention of the American people.

I believe the veterans' group of last week, who came to this House for recognition, and whose entreaties were denied by this House, should know where these stupendous funds are going. I believe the American taxpayer has the right to know whether the dollar which he is using for Public Works and Civil Works, partially by way of a dole, is producing the greatest degree of benefit the dollar can produce. I believe there should be an examination, an investigation, and an analysis, if you will, from time to time, and I for one, speaking only as an individual from the minority side, declare to this House today, that we are not satisfied to excuse the duty we believe is ours by simply saying—it is none of our business.

We are opposed to lump-sum appropriations. We are opposed to the program by which great sums can be dispensed under the patronage and the privilege of one single man or group of men. I believe there should be returned to this body the right to appropriate the funds of the American taxpayers, and I believe you and I should set ourselves about putting our house in order toward that end. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND].

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to say something in line with the very illuminating statement of the gentleman from Oklahoma about our Indian neighbors, because in Alaska we have about 30,000 Indians and Eskimos, all of whom, I think, are properly classed and classifiable as Indians.

There is one outstanding fact in connection with the administration of Indian affairs in the United States and Alaska, and that is the comparatively little attention that has been paid to the native Indians of Alaska. This can be illustrated by an examination of the report upon the bill which we are now considering—the Interior Department appropriation bill.

We find from an examination of these figures that accepting the ward Indians of the United States at 240,000—and I have no doubt the gentleman from Oklahoma is correct in that figure—we find a total appropriation for their benefit, a total gratuity appropriation, not including any appropriation for other purposes, during the fiscal year 1935 of nearly $14,000,000. The bill carries for these Indians and for the Alaska Indians the sum of $14,631,255, but we must subtract from this approximately $766,000 which is to be spent in Alaska, so we have left a balance of a little less than $14,000,000. We divide this among 240,000 Indians, and I believe it will amount to somewhere between $59 and $60 apiece. Let us take the figures for Alaska, amounting to $766,000, and divide that by 30,000, which is approximately the number of Indians in Alaska, although it may vary a few hundred either way, and we have somewhere around $29 apiece for the Indians of Alaska, and this is simply an illustration of what has been going on ever since Alaska was taken over from Russia.

There was a time a few years ago when money was more plentiful in the United States Treasury and when increased appropriations were made for the natives of Alaska, but the appropriations have been constantly cut down in recent years.

It may be said that wages have decreased and costs generally have gone down; but, Mr. Chairman, they have not gone down in Alaska to the same extent they have in the United States, and we must remember in considering Alaska and in considering the welfare of the Indians there that the supplies must be transported a long way; that the school teachers, physicians, and nurses must pay a lot of money to get there to administer the affairs of the Indians. We must also consider the vast area of the country, some 589,000 square miles, and then determine whether these appropriations ought to be reduced. As a matter of fact, if the Indians of Alaska were treated with the same degree of generosity—if you can call it generosity—as the Indians of the United States, instead of having $766,000 for next year, we would have at least $1,500,000 for the Alaska Indians.

Now, you may ask, Do they need it? I know they need it. A good many of them are in a desperate and a pitiable condition, and I do not know what some of them would have done this past winter if it had not been for the Civil Works program which took care of some of the most necessitous cases, the work being rotated so as to give all of them a little money—a mere pittance at that.

And what is the cause of their condition? The cause of their condition in this place, as in every other place in the United States, is the advent and the aggression of the white man. I do not say that the Indians have been robbed. After all, they lived in communities, and they had a sort of communal government. One man had a valley in which he would hunt, and another had a certain area in which he would fish, and, of course, none of them had any title to the property which he used, as we understand title, though their rights were well understood among themselves. They had no deeds of title, and they had no records of title; and when the white men came in, you may be sure the newcomers paid no attention to the rights or the claims of the Indians, and consequently, even with many individual acts of generosity and forbearance on the part of the white men, the Indian was crowded out of the picture and was really deprived of what, to him, amounted to property rights, valuable property rights. He was simply shoved aside, and his property was taken from him.

Now, there is a compensation that can be made, there is a cure for it, and that is partly in the education of the Indians. A part of the cure for it is the furnishing of proper medical and hospital facilities and educational facilities until they can adapt themselves to the modes of life of the white man. They are teachable; I have seen enough to know that. My young friend Marshall says that the Indian children are as intelligent as the white children of school age brought up under anything like the same conditions. The Indians are teachable and adaptable to the modes and manners of the white man, but you know when it comes to a matter of business they are simply outclassed. They do not know; they have not got the cunning; they have not got the business ability of the white man; and consequently if you leave them without any help, their status is miserable.

The one thing that I appeal for is the same treatment of the Alaska Indians that you are giving to the ward Indians in the United States. You can give them that by increasing the money for school facilities and hospital facilities.

Mr. Bancroft says that at one time on the Kodiak Islands the Indian population was 10,000, and today it is probably not over a thousand. Of course, the white men are not responsible for all that. Many things have tended to reduce the population. The natives are easily susceptible to disease, and tuberculosis is rife among them.

Mr. KVALE. Let me ask the gentleman, have not they got some help from the Public Works?

Mr. DIMOND. They have got some funds, but, as I understand, no further Public Works funds can be obtained until Congress makes further appropriation. The Indian Bureau has a substantial program for the construction of hospitals for the natives of Alaska, but no funds can be obtained to carry out that program now. I hope and trust that the hospitals may be built, for I know they are badly needed.

Now, I do not think that our Indians ought to be taken care of in this way simply as an emergency, but that substantial and greatly increased appropriations should be made for them year after year, so that they will get the same treatment, whether fair or not, that is awarded to the Indians in the United States.

Now, I wanted to say something more, but it would take too long to read the resolution I have here that was adopted by the Indian Affairs Committee some time ago, when my predecessor, Judge Wickersham, was in Congress. I shall refer to that some other time in connection with the bill which I have introduced giving to the Tlingit and Haida Indians the right to bring suit in the Court of Claims. But that is a separate matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the Delegate from Alaska has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. DIMOND. I wanted to say something more about the education of the Indians. They are responsive to education. The children like to go to school. Yes; there is some vice among the Indians, but I think not more than there is among the white men. A great many people think that the Indians, if left to themselves, will debauch themselves with liquor. They do not do it in Alaska. As a matter of fact, the spirit of temperance, of real temperance, amounting generally to abstinence, is stronger in some of the Indian communities than in the white communities.

I had two appeals recently. To illustrate the necessity for further and larger appropriations for the benefit of natives, I shall refer these two appeals. One was from Solomon, Alaska. A white woman wrote to me and said that there were 10 or 12 children there that had no school facilities. They wanted a school. About a third of the pupils in the white schools, the Territorial schools outside of the incorporated cities, are natives or cross-bloods of some degree. We all concede that it is the duty of the Federal Government to look after the Indians; but when the Government does not do it, the Territory does the best that it can to give every child, whether Indian or white, some kind of an education. The Territory did not have the money to build a school there or to hire a teacher. I appealed to the Indian Bureau. That Bureau said: We have not the money, although we realize the necessity for this. There are children there growing up without any education. They have been crowded out of their old environment, and we are not giving them help in the new environment to educate them.

I had a letter also from a place called Ugashik, where the same condition exists. They want a school there; they have none. The Bureau of Indian Affairs has no money.

I am not criticizing the Bureau at all. I think the officials of the Bureau are devoted to the welfare of the Indians. They want to do everything they can, and they are doing everything they can, and they say to me, if you can get any more money out of Congress, God knows we are willing to do the work; we want to educate the children, but we have not the money to do it. I appeal to this House to give any native friends in Alaska the aid and relief to which they are entitled in justice. I thank you.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to read as part of my remarks a nonpartisan editorial that I have in my possession.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I live in the city of Battle Creek, which has a population of about 43,000. It is a town that is typically Midwestern and, I think, is quite characteristic of at least the northern and central parts of the United States. There is an independent newspaper in that city, the Enquirer and Evening News, the editor of which is a real humanitarian and a close personal friend of mine. I noticed a day or two ago in that paper an editorial dealing with a subject which I know is of interest to us all, certainly expressing my thoughts in a way so clear and so concise that I have varied from my common practice here in the House of Representatives and asked permission to read the editorial into the RECORD. I think that all of us are to a considerable degree in sympathy with the giving of employment by the Government to people in times such as these. I am sure there is no Member of the House who is not humane enough to realize that to a certain degree the furnishing of employment by the Government is necessary; but I think perhaps we lose sight sometimes of the fact that it is not only a matter of the present but that perhaps a very grave situation may develop, unless it is terminated at the proper time, which will affect the lives and happiness of American citizens, and perhaps the permanence of the Republic.

The editor of this paper says:

LIVING ON GOVERNMENT

Approximately 12,000 persons in Battle Creek are making a living, in whole or in part, from government, or about 1 in every 3.5 persons of the city's population of 43,575.

As reported in the news story which contained these facts, some receive theirs through pensions, some are working on C.W.A. and P.W.A. jobs, others are employed in regular work for the Federal, State, city, county governments, others by the schools.

Throughout the country some 22,000,000 American citizens are drawing cash from the Federal Treasury. That is 1 out of every 5.

Much of the increase in the number of persons dependent on the Government is due, of course, to the national recovery program through which not only have millions been given C.W.A. and P.W.A. jobs but thousands of others have been employed to carry on the vast amount of work entailed in the operation of the many new bureaus and agencies which have been created.

It may be said that this wholesale subsidization of citizens is necessary now. It is part of the new deal to put men to work, to provide wages instead of doles, to thaw out frozen banks, to bolster business and industry, to relieve the mortgage pressure on farmers and home owners.

It may be said that this is the price we are paying to recover from the illness we have been suffering from for 4 years.

The plan of providing useful work for those who otherwise must have their needs supplied by the public is and should be fully endorsed.

It can also be said, as sincerely and logically, that a government cannot exist long when and if a majority of its citizens become dependent upon it for their livelihood.

The more who draw their wages, salaries, pensions, and subsistence from the Government the fewer there are left to provide the money with which to support government.

The more who become dependent upon Government, the more agencies and bureaus that are created, the more money it will take to keep them going and the higher taxes will become, with fewer left to pay them.

So, while remarking that this increase in Government subsidy, so large as to put 1 out of every 3.5 persons in a community the size of Battle Creek on Government dependence—while granting that this is necessary now as part of the hospital bill—it also needs to be remarked that this percentage cannot get much larger and that it cannot be allowed to remain as large as it now is a minute longer than necessary.

Our present program must be a means to an end, and the end is a betterment of business and so of private employment.

With the statement made in this editorial I believe most of you will heartily and cordially agree. The old theory of government throughout the world for centuries past has been that it is the duty of citizens to support the government, but in the last few years there has grown up in this country, as there has grown up in countries throughout the world, the reverse of that theory—that it is the duty of the Government to support the people. It is impossible to see how this theory can permeate much more than it has through our social life without seeing the possibility of the end of this Republic as we have always known it. It is nothing new in the history of the world. The other great example of a republic, the greatest Republic besides our own that history has known, is the Roman Republic. After its long period of prosperity and fame it went down that shadowy path, down which so many of the republics and kingdoms of the world have marched, largely because of the fact that the people—not the slaves, but the Roman citizens—came to the conclusion in the course of the years that it was the duty of the Government to support them, and so with each new regime the cry went up of "Bread and circuses", and Emperor after Emperor was lifted up and torn down again because of that demand on the part of the people of Rome.

I am not saying or thinking that is to be the fate of the United States, I am not saying for a moment that it is not necessary and is not right for the Government in a time of world crisis to come to the rescue of its citizens as the Government has done under these circumstances. I think that that is axiomatic. We can all agree on that, but I do believe, and I am saying this from a perfectly nonpartisan standpoint, that it is the duty of legislators to see that at as early a date as possible the expenditure of vast sums of money by the Government to furnish employment shall come to an end. There will be pressure enough brought upon every Congress which sits here in the next 5 or 10 years to have it extend and continue and carry on governmental support of its citizens.

But I believe that we, Republicans and Democrats alike, having in our minds the fate that must befall our Republic if the idea is once encouraged that the Government will continue to support millions of its citizens and that it will go beyond that and make itself paymaster to 2 out of every 7 people living in a city of the size of my city, to 1 person out of every 5 throughout the United States, should resolve that at the first possible moment the vast expenditure of Federal sums to this end should cease. If not, it will leave a blight on the national character for generations and may, in the end, be the downfall of the state. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The Members who are not present are going to be very disappointed when they find I have spoken and they were not here today. [Laughter and applause.]

I endorse very much of what has just been said by my distinguished friend from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER]. I believe that the American Congress and the American people should begin to understand now that the real reconstruction and rehabilitation work has yet to be done. I agree in the main with the emergency program. This Nation is in the hospital, being treated for its malady. This is not a normal situation, nor is the present program one which the Government, under ordinary circumstances, can afford to maintain. There are some very interesting things taking place in this country now. For the first time in a long time the American people are trying to think again. That is interesting, too. The American people are going to have to send to this Chamber and to the Chamber at the other end of the hall the highest type of statesmanship this country has ever produced if it is to deal properly with the problems which soon will confront the American people. The American people of this generation have to demonstrate the greatest capacity of self-government that any people have ever demonstrated since time began if they are to deal successfully with these problems. There is no doubt about it. Insofar as I can understand this particular period of ours, it is a recurrence of that fascinatingly interesting phenomenon rather frequently, relatively speaking, to be found in the history of Anglo-Saxon systems of government. The ability to maintain the sort of government we have is dependent, in the main, of course, upon the people having the capacity to govern themselves under ordinary circumstances through the institutions and the divisions of governmental power and duty peculiar to our system of government as it usually operates, but it is also and none the less dependent upon the ability of the people instinctively to sense the presence of a great crisis, to sense a situation which requires quicker pick-up and a stronger government than the Anglo-Saxon systems of government, operating through its ordinary machinery, is able to provide.

When such conditions come, one of two things must happen. Either the Government would be destroyed by the existence of a crisis which exceeds the capacity of the Government, or the people for the time being must concentrate governmental power. They must develop for the time being governmental agency and machinery with a quicker pick-up and greater power than the Anglo-Saxon system ordinarily provides.

In talking with my people at home, and as I have gone back and forth across the country during vacation, I have become convinced that the people have instinctively sensed the necessity to do exactly that thing; instinctively have done it. The Anglo-Saxon people, in such situations as that, have demonstrated ability to concentrate that power, but to reserve the power to control its exercise, and reserve the power to recapture and redistribute that power when the crisis shall have ended. The Congress has reserved the right to take from the President all powers given and has reserved the right to recapture and redistribute those powers when this crisis shall have ended. We should not fall into the error of believing that we are in a revolution; that these things we are doing now mean permanent revolution, permanent change in the operation of our system of government. Anglo-Saxon peoples do not so readily effect such great changes in their systems of government. This is not a new thing with us. During the war those of us who were in Congress then sensed exactly what we sense now.

The country is now operating under war psychology, and the country has given to the President war powers, but the big job that is going to challenge our statesmanship and challenge the governmental capacity of the people will be when we reach the point of weaning away from the Public Treasury those people now living off the Public Treasury and when we come to take the power of this Government away from these great Federal bureaus and give them back to the people. That is going to require real statesmanship on the part of those who sit here, and on the part of the American people. During a time like this when those powers are being concentrated as a matter of economical self-preservation, it is in line with sound public policy to leave resting upon the people of this country every responsibility that we can possibly leave resting upon them. The greatest danger that grows out of these things that are now being done comes from relieving the people of their accustomed governmental responsibilities, relieving them of the necessity to struggle with the problems of government. In proportion as people are relieved from the necessity to struggle, to think, and to do, you tend to destroy their ability to do. The ability to do a thing is acquired only by doing it. Nature utterly refuses to give to human beings powers which they do not exercise. Absolutely, it is the law of God Almighty. It is universal. Here we are, more than 100,000,000 people being made dependent upon a great Federal Government. The States do not count, apparently. Municipalities are doing almost nothing on their own responsibility. The cry all over the Nation is, " On to Washington! " Now, that is dangerous. We are having to do these dangerous things. I do not want to be misunderstood, Mr. Chairman. I recognize the necessity for doing them now, but I do not underestimate the danger that results from doing them. Not only is there the tendency on the part of the Federal Government to deal with every economic problem, however local and personal, but I am sorry to say there is developing a tendency on the part of the Federal Government to enter the field of law enforcement in the various communities. That is something the people can do. I noticed the other day a statement in the public press that the Department of Justice is engaged in the prosecution of people in the city of Philadelphia for racketeering.

If we do these economic things, and in addition the Federal Government begins to take over the States' business of police protection, how can we hope to preserve, much less increase, the governmental capacity of the States and of their people? Nobody can be ignorant of the fact that as the Federal Government goes in, the tendency is for the States to step out and let Uncle Sam do it. There are some very magnificent indications apparent as you go about over the country which this would operate against. I made it my business to go into the Chicago situation this summer. I think Chicago is making the most magnificent demonstration of the ability of its people to govern themselves to be found on this continent anywhere. Just a little while ago everybody pointed the finger of scorn at Chicago, gangster-ridden. They tried to get the Federal Government to go in and clean up their situation. They could not get that done. Necessity compelled them to get on the job. They are working at it in dead earnest. Of course, they have got a big job yet. That is fine. That is what they need. These jobs will never be finished. Intelligent people talk about settling something, settling something—nothing is settled. These difficulties that human beings have to grapple with—as I have said so often, I am almost ashamed to repeat it—these difficulties that people have to grapple with are nothing on earth but the gymnastic paraphernalia provided by God Almighty in His big economy for the development of human beings. Whoever takes away from the people the necessity to do that which they can do robs the people of the chance of development which comes from doing things. It is not getting rid of these racketeers that is important primarily. In some communities they are the best thing they could have, for they act as a mustard plaster on a lethargic condition, stimulating the people to activity and, therefore, to development.

I do not like to disagree with the policy of the Attorney General, but I have to disagree with him. I think he did a bad thing when he went into Philadelphia and undertook to have the Federal Government prosecute racketeering in that city. If they have racketeers in Philadelphia, that is what they need in Philadelphia, and they ought to racket and racket until the people of Philadelphia cannot stand them any longer. Citizens who are skulking and failing to discharge their duty will come forth and get the thrill which comes from the consciousness of being good citizens. We are going to need, for the work of tomorrow, millions of citizens trained and developed through the grapple with difficult problems of government. This is their Government.

There is a great awakening among the American people with regard to the suppression of crime. We are going to need all the development—I want to repeat this statement—we are going to need in the great job of tomorrow all the development which the American people can get from doing those things which fall within their power. We must not forget that in these days. In this emergency we are taking away from the American people much of the responsibility which they formerly had. We are taking away from the States responsibilities which they formerly had. We have before us today not the picture of sovereign States but that of governmental vassals appealing at the doors of the Federal Treasury to borrow back the money that has been paid or must be paid by their own taxpayers. We have the picture of municipalities coming to the Federal Government to borrow money that has been paid or must be paid into the Treasury by their own taxpayers. We have the picture of Federal employees going all over this country telling people what to do if they would get part of their own money. That cannot continue, and we must get ready for the day when it must end. The only possible preparation is a citizenship with great capacity for self-government.

The President understands it; we understand it. People usually have to do these extraordinary things which we are doing, because they failed to do what ought to have been done when it could have been done safely. It is the penalty which Nature provides for failure to carry out its plan of government. I wish the Federal Government would keep out of this one job of enforcing the law and preserving the public peace in the communities of the country.

I appreciate very much your listening to me while I make this rather disconnected statement.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Did the gentleman state that Chicago, Ill., is an ideal city in the matter of crime suppression?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I said that Chicago, Ill., under the lash of necessity, has become a community where there is the most magnificent demonstration of the upstirring of the people of a community that I know of in America.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Has the gentleman ever heard of Milwaukee, Wis., as being an ideal city for law enforcement?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I have never heard anything to the contrary.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Well, the gentleman had better look it up.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I spent 4 days in Chicago. I talked with street-car conductors, talked with policemen, talked with little merchants, talked with big merchants, lawyers, bankers, with people representing a cross section of the community; and I found in that city an arousing, determined purpose to clean up that community. I do not believe I can be mistaken about it. I know; we have had it in the Committee on the Judiciary; we have watched the present attitude and purpose as it began to develop. It was not long ago—the papers of Chicago would write about these gang captains meeting to divide their territory as they would write of a meeting of the League of Nations. At that time the public officers were afraid or bought. When I was there I found those officers vying with each other in putting these rats in the penitentiary. Why do they do it? They do it because they have to do it; public opinion directs and supports them. Necessity developed that opinion, and effort developed the capacity of the people.

I think the finest bit of concentrated philosophy to be found anywhere is the philosophy embodied in the fable of the old lark and the little larks in the wheat field.

The old lark, as the wheat began to get ready to be harvested, told the little larks to listen and tell what they heard. The first report was that the farmer and his sons came out and said: "This wheat is ready to cut and we are going to invite all of our friends." The old lark said: "We do not have to move yet." The next report was that the farmer and his boy had come out and said: "Well, our friends disappointed us. We are going to invite our kinfolks in." The old lark said: "We do not have to leave yet." The next report was that the farmer had said: "Well, our kinfolks have not come and our friends have not come. Tomorrow morning we are going to begin to cut the wheat." And the old lark said: "It is time to move."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. When they were coming in from Chicago and appealing to their "friends" to come out and clean up Chicago the gangsters knew they did not have to move yet, but when the people of Chicago said: "Others have failed us and we are going to clean them up"; then the gangsters knew it was time to be going some place else.

I want to make this additional statement: What is happening in Chicago is that in their effort to clean up they are developing for that city the sort of citizenship which that city needs generally and which the country must have. Suppose some outside agency had done this job. It would have left just the sort of people, but a little meeker, than when that agency went in.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Has that not been the public sentiment in Milwaukee for the last 15 years and of only recent origin in Chicago?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Maybe it has been; I do not know. This I do know, that when people determine to bring about a given result, that given result takes place. But it is not that result which is most important. It is the development of a decent rural, self-reliant, capable, courageous, self-respecting people as a result of these efforts and achievements which is the important thing.

In these times when we are relieving much of the problems which the States used to have and relieving the municipalities of much of the problems they used to have, we ought to leave on the people's shoulders the doing of everything that they can do, because tomorrow they will have to deal with these big problems which grow out of the situation we are now having to deal with. People with strong muscles will be needed. We are going to need a brave, courageous, high-class American citizenship, and that citizenship can only be developed by doing something. That is what I am trying to impress upon you now. Any policy which takes from the American people the necessity of doing anything they can do robs the future of the chance to have a people who can deal adequately with the problems of tomorrow.

Mr. DUFFEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. DUFFEY. Apropos of what the gentleman said, does not the gentleman think it is having a bad effect on Congress to relieve the Congress of so many legislative functions it used to have?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; it does; but we have concentrated at Washington so much Government responsibility—I do not mean during this crisis alone, but generally—that it is utterly beyond human capacity to discharge through any agency of Government which is susceptible of public control. We can talk about bureaus all we please, but when the total governmental responsibility concentrated at Washington exceeds the capacity of the Legislature to discharge there is no other way to take care of the overload except to create bureaus and turn the work over to them.

Just as soon as we get through with this crisis we are going to be face to face with the proposition of either decentralizing governmental responsibility and sending all we can back to the States or contenting ourselves to be governed from now on by a great Federal bureaucracy.

Mr. DUFFEY. The problem I have in mind was a little different than the one the gentleman has discussed. What I mean is this: During the last special session of Congress, the Congress seemed to confine itself almost entirely to putting a formal O.K. on legislation originating in the executive departments, sent to the legislative body already drafted and the Congress simply went through the formality of O.K.ing it. I ask the gentleman if that sort of thing is not bad for the country?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. I tried to discuss that in the beginning. Here is what I think about that, and I tried to make that pretty clear. I will repeat myself, because I want to be very clear about that. I believe we would make a big mistake if we were to come to the conclusion that these extraordinary arrangements now made are to be continued as a part of our governmental policy after this crisis shall have ended. I think it would be an awful mistake if the American people and the American Congress should be confused about that.

Here is what I think about these particular things. I tried to make them clear in the beginning, and at the risk of being tiresome I will more or less repeat. I have arrived at this conclusion from the best examination I have been able to make with reference to the functioning machinery of Anglo-Saxon systems of government. I discovered it, and I am sure I am right about it, that the ability of the Anglo-Saxon peoples to perpetuate their systems of government in no small degree is dependent upon their ability instinctively to sense the existence of a great crisis which exceeds the capacity of the ordinary governmental arrangement. The Anglo-Saxon people in the face of a great crisis seem instinctively to sense that fact and seem to be able to concentrate governmental power in order to give to the new arrangement as quick a pick-up and as great power as a dictator could have.

Most peoples confronting situations like we are confronting now would turn all the powers of government over to a dictator, lose control over their exercise and lose all recapture powers. Anglo-Saxon peoples seem able to turn over those powers temporarily and at the same time retain the power of control over their exercise and retain recapture powers. I think that is the situation we are in now. We have given to the President all the power we could give to a dictator, and we have as quick a pick-up as if we had a dictator, and yet this Congress has retained the power to control their exercise and we have retained the power to recapture them when we get through this crisis and redistribute them. There will be much to do when we get through this crisis, but we are not going through the processes of a revolutionary change in the distinctive characteristics of our system of government. While we are doing these extraordinary things we ought not to lose sight of the bigger job which awaits us at the end of this crisis and of the duty to preserve among the people all of governmental responsibility which does not have to be surrendered in order to deal with this crisis. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, obviously the financial position of the Government of the United States is in a far worse condition than it has ever been in its history. The President in his Budget message, which he sent to Congress on the second day of this session, disclosed that between June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, the Government of the United States will have spent $7,309,000,000 more money than it will have received from all sources of revenue. This means that in 1 year's time the debt of the Federal Government has increased to the extent of $60.90 for each man, woman, and child in the United States. Each citizen may just as well mark it down that during the 12 months between June 30, 1933, and June 30, 1934, his debt has increased $60.90. Each family in which there are five people will have its debt increased slightly over $300 for the year ending June 30, 1934. In accordance with the President's Budget message, by June 30 of this year the national debt will be $29,847,000,000, or approximately $30,000,000,000. This will be $4,000,000,000 more than the Government of the United States has ever been in debt. At the end of the war the total debt of the Government was slightly over $26,000,000,000. The Government debt on June 30, 1934, in accordance with the President's message, will be $249 for every man, woman, and child in the country. In other words, in a family of five people the share of the national debt which that family will owe on June 30, 1934, will be $1,245.

The President's Budget message discloses that for this fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, the Government is spending $10,569,000,000. It also discloses that the total receipts for the period will be $3,259,000,000. This means in simple language that the Government will have 35 cents of revenue for every dollar which it spends. In other words, every time it spends a dollar during this year for any purpose, it is going in debt 65 cents. Putting it another way, when the Government spends slightly over $10,000,000,000 this year, it spends more than the total receipts received by this Government from all sources from 1791 to 1900. In other words, the Government is spending more money in 1 year than it took in during its first 109 years.

The President's Budget message discloses that the national debt will soon be $30,000,000,000. If this Congress is to provide the expenditures for the next fiscal year, which is from June 30, 1934, to June 30, 1935, in accordance with the President's proposed Budget, the debt on June 30, 1935, will be $32,000,000,000. That will mean an increase in the national debt of $16,000,000,000 in 4 years' time. To make that simple it means that the national debt will have exactly doubled in 4 years. In order to make this a little more understandable, increasing the national debt $16,000,000,000 in 4 years means increasing the national debt practically as much as the entire amount of the receipts of the United States Government from its beginning in 1791 up to the time we entered the war in 1917. Or, putting it another way, in 4 years' time the Government of the United States will have gone in debt practically as much money as it collected from the people from all sources during the first 126 years of its existence.

During the first 126 years of this Government's existence, or up until the time we entered the war in 1917, the total receipts of the Government were $17,597,000,000. From 1917 to 1932 the Government collected from the people $64,000,000,000. This means that during the last 16 years the Government has collected from the people almost four times as much money as it collected from the people in the first 126 years of its existence. This is only a part of the story. In addition to the $64,000,000,000 which the Government has collected from the people during the last 16 years it has gone in debt $30,000,000,000. That means that during the last 16 years the Government has spent more than five times as much as it took in during the first 126 years of its life.

So far as the public debt of the American people is concerned, this financial record of the Government of the United States only tells a part of the story. The 48 States, the counties, cities, and school districts of the land have multiplied their debt during the same period of time. I am not so sure but that this program of increasing the public debt has already led us to a place where universal bankruptcy and financial ruin is inescapable. It might be that if we could stop now we could pay out. The people of the United States may just as well mark it down now that neither the President nor the Congress, the Governors nor the State legislatures, the city nor the county administering boards can or will stop this program. There comes a time in the existence of any government, autocracy or democracy, when the destiny of that government and that civilization is in the hands of the people rather than in the hands of public officials, for be they kings or elective officers they have their hands tied.

This colossal public debt growing out of an orgy of public spending has not been the result of any material increase in the normal cost of the Government but rather has been the direct result of a public demand for an increase in the functions and purposes of government. If government, national, State, and local, were not doing anything now and had not been doing anything during the last 16 years except what government was doing prior to 1916, the public debt would be only a small part of its present amount. This is true even if we include the war debt. Even at this moment it is not the cost of the war which is bringing financial bankruptcy upon every governmental unit in the country, it is the cost growing out of the extensions of governmental activities which have little or no relation to the war.

It is true that the public in general is inclined to place its curse upon the President, the Congress, the governors, the State legislatures, and local administering boards for this public expense. It is true that this curse has been placed upon former holders of these offices as well as the present holders of these offices, yet the fact remains that practically every additional dollar of public money which has been spent during the last 16 years is the direct result of either a widespread public demand for new expenditures or the demand of some coercing and militant minority which has served notice upon public officials that their votes are for the official who answers their demands for public funds, and that their votes are against such officials who will not answer their demand for public money. Practically all public officials have answered these demands to a greater or less degree. Some of these officials have rejected parts of these demands and have been replaced by others who grant them. It is not my purpose by these remarks to try to absolve all public officials from all blame for the present financial condition of the Government. That is far from my purpose. Public officials over the country by the thousands have done much to encourage the people in the thought that it is their right and privilege that public funds be used for private benefits. The thought which I am trying to express is that the mistakes which have been made are the mistakes of the American people as a whole, officials, and citizens. Above all, the further thought which I wish to express is that there is no hope to correct this situation except that the responsibility of meeting it is accepted by the American people as well as by public officials.

What is the present situation? The President in his Budget says that he plans and hopes to balance the expenses and income during the fiscal year beginning June 30, 1934, and ending June 30, 1935. It is his estimate that our indebtedness for that year will be $2,000,000,000, and that thereafter the income and expenses will balance. Under present conditions I cannot see a shadow of a hope for this estimate of the President's to be realized. I hope against hope that, either through recovery or some other condition, we can so minimize the expenses of the Government that the expenditures for the fiscal year between July 1, 1934, and June 30, 1935, will not exceed the revenue by more than $2,000,000,000; however, from all that is apparent to me, it will be my guess that the expenditures for that year will exceed the revenue by far more than the $2,000,000,000, which the President has estimated in his Budget. I do not question the President's sincerity in his Budget. I do not question his hope to achieve that purpose. I simply think that it is going to be beyond his control. The present demands of the people are entirely too numerous to offer any hope of holding the expenditures down to $2,000,000,000 in excess of the revenue during the year between July 1, 1934, and June 30, 1935.

Let us see what are some of the demands coming direct from the people. Every State is demanding more money from the Federal Government. At the same time practically every State is struggling to keep from going bankrupt. Local communities are demanding more money. The financial institutions through the R.F.C. are demanding more money. No one knows how much that will be. The people with mortgages on their farms and homes are going to demand more and more money from the Government. The total amount of these mortgages represents approximately $20,000,000,000, providing we keep the city mortgages down to $5,000 and less. The veterans of all wars are demanding a complete restoration of their pay. My judgment is that we more nearly see the beginning than the end of unemployment relief.

The report from the American Federation of Labor discloses that during the last year, 6,400,000 unemployed have been returned to work, yet, from the report you will find that only 1,800,000 of them have been returned to permanent work, while 4,600,000 are at work under the C.W.A., P.W.A., and C.C.C. The sad part of the report is that the funds for the employment of 4,000,000 of these men are exhausted on February 15. In addition to all of this, the federation report confronts us with the staggering fact that there are yet 10,702,000 idle. Therefore, with the C.W.A. funds exhausted on February 15, we shall have on the unemployed list the 4,000,000 now working for the C.W.A. together with 10,702,000 still idle. This means that on February 15 the total of unemployed is 14,702,000. All of these unemployed are looking to the Government to give them work. The increase of P.W.A. work can take care of only a part of them.

These demands of States, counties, cities, financial institutions, individuals in financial trouble, the unemployed, veterans, and public employees are all being made upon the Treasury of a country which has for 4 years been spending more than twice what it has been taking in and which must immediately float a bonded indebtedness of $10,000,000,000, and at which time out of 13 of its outstanding bond issues, 8 of the issues are selling below par.

The remarks which I make are not being made so much in the hope that either the Congress or the President can correct a serious condition. It is more in the nature of a cry to the country, trying the best I can to lay the true facts before the people in the hope that the people of America may yet be able to come to the aid of their country and preserve the republic. The republic as a bankrupt institution cannot survive. No government can survive which is not a solvent government. No government is with certainty a solvent government which is in the financial dilemma in which today we find the Government of the United States, and the government of practically all the States and local units.

The Congress is always more responsive to public demands than the President. That is in the nature of things. Since March 4 the country has practically been under the control of the President. Under his presidential control we see from the report of his Budget that in the first fiscal year of his administration the Government will have spent ten and one-half billion dollars. I am satisfied that if the Congress were left alone without any Executive influence it would immediately provide for expenditures, either of governmental money or governmental credit, which would amount to $30,000,000,000. I think Congress would answer the demand that the Government take over the mortgages at a total of $20,000,000,000. In the most favorable light this would mean the use of $20,000,000,000 of Government credit. In addition to this, Congress would accept the soldier bonus of 2½ billion dollars. Congress would also accept a minimum of 7½ billion dollars for public works and other similar relief. This suggestion that Congress would provide for $30,000,000,000 is not an extravagant suggestion. It is a conservative suggestion, for in addition to these items, Congress would doubtless provide for the lending of money to industries and a number of other things which would weigh heavily upon the public funds or public credit. All of this, which I think Congress would do, would be in response to public demands. If these public demands are not for some reason or other changed, they will sooner or later be granted. This is a democracy, and the public will, whether it be wise or unwise, will eventually be fulfilled.

What will be the price which the public will pay for this? In the first place, the most of what the people think will be aid which they are getting from the Government may turn out not to be aid at all. It may simply be that they have turned their property over to the Government and they are mere tenants and vassals of the Government. The present situation in the banks is a fair example. The banks with their preferred stock are now in some instances and in the near future may generally find that what they have done is that they have turned their banks over to the Government. The Government is running them. Sooner or later the Government may be appointing bank presidents as it is now appointing postmasters. I am not so sure but that the R.F.C. is doing that now in some instances. If the Government takes over mortgages on real estate and does it in wholesale, the next step may easily be ownership. It is a very short distance from a mortgage to a deed. With everyone in distress seeking employment from the Government, it simply means that they are becoming absolutely dependent upon the Government. Whether we realize it or not, we are carrying ourselves into a state of communism just as rapidly as we can do it. About all that there is to communism is that the government owns everything and everyone works for the government. With multiplied millions going to work for the Government, millions of property owners calling upon the Government to take care of their mortgages, the banks of the country selling preferred stock to the Government carrying a provision for voting power, and the railroads and other institutions borrowing from the Government, will, in my judgment, in the end, more likely prove to be an outright transfer of ownership to the Government than aid from the Government to perpetuate private ownership.

One thing is certain in the immediate future the very preservation of government and society as we have known it is going to depend upon the Government's preserving the par value of its outstanding bonds. I know that we hear it said that the bonds are all owned by some financial pirates and international swindlers. In part this is true, but the fact still remains that the most sound and honest banks of the country find their bond cases filled with Government bonds. A 20-percent drop in the par value of these bonds would wipe out the surplus of thousands of banks which have been operated honestly and conservatively. This is obviously true, because they have invested their deposits in what should be the most sacred investment, namely, Government bonds. My friends, you cannot let the good banks of this country, whose money is invested in Government bonds, fail without impoverishing multiplied millions of honest, hard-working, thrifty American citizens. You cannot do this to this great mass of thrifty people without wrecking the civilization of the country. In order to escape this, the Government will have to preserve the value of its bonds. It will have to pay the banks and insurance companies dollars at the par value of these bonds, even though they be mere paper dollars. The banks and insurance companies will at least be able to use the paper dollars to pay the dollars which they owe to their depositors and policyholders. If the Government bonds continue to depreciate in value, sooner or later the amount of printing-press inflation will depend entirely upon the amount which we increase the public debt. As this goes on, prices of the things for which there is an open foreign market will soar to heights entirely out of line with the checks of the wage earners of the country. The result will be that the producers of wheat, hogs, cattle, dairy, poultry, and other products for which there is no foreign outlet for our surplus will most likely not enjoy the increase in prices ordinarily incident to the depreciation of the value of money. These producers, the wage earners, the widows, orphans, and beneficiaries of the insurance policies, the unemployed, together with others all reaching into multiplied millions, will be the victims of the program. All of which will have grown out of the unwise policy, which history before us without exception has told us was unwise, of the Government's continuing to spend money in excess of its income.

Let me now bring this to the attention of the House of Representatives: This Government for 4 straight years has been spending more money than it has been taking in. The Government has only three ways of obtaining money—collecting it from taxes, borrowing it, or printing it. Long since we have found we are unable to collect enough money from taxes, and this is why we have been running in the red for 4 years. How much longer we are going to continue to be able to borrow money no man knows. We can only continue to borrow money as long as the people in the United States have the hope that some day and sometime a Congress will do what no Congress has done for 4 years, namely, provide enough revenue to meet the expenses of government.

Every bond that has been sold in the last 4 years, or that will be sold, if it is worth the paper it is written on, it will only be because some day and some time a Congress will do what this Congress will not do and what three preceding Congresses would not do—namely, provide enough revenue to meet the expenses of Government and enough more to make a payment on the bonds which have theretofore been issued.

This Congress does not talk much about meeting the obligation of paying bonds. There is more talk about repudiation than payment of bonds already outstanding, and repudiation will not be possible without surrendering our civilization. We cannot pay such a price.

Of course, we have to meet the responsibility of meeting the emergency of human hunger. There is no question about this; but it would be better a hundred times if we had the courage in this country of ours to levy whatever tax is necessary to meet this expense. It is indefensible to turn into a national debt a debt incurred for the purpose of taking care of our people today. This is the obligation of you and me of this generation. This is not the obligation of the next generation. It may be defensible to build lasting and permanent improvements which the future generations may enjoy and let them pay a part of it as a result of a bonded indebtedness, but it is indefensible to pass on to our children and to our posterity a debt incurred for something which they do not enjoy.

Our public relief work—there is not an infinitesimal part of it that will be of benefit to the next generations. The last penny of it should be paid and paid now. Of course, there is only one way to do it, and that is to levy a general manufacturers' sales tax. [Applause.] For my part I am willing to meet the obligation of feeding the hungry of this country, but I would pay for it now, no matter what the sales-tax rate might be. In other words, I would see to it that you and I and those of our fellow citizens who are able to feed themselves must here and now pay to feed those who cannot feed themselves, but I would not pass it on, in a bonded debt, for posterity to pay. It is morally wrong, and here is the price we are going to have to pay.

Whenever the credit of this country becomes impaired and we have to turn to the printing press, it is then that the great struggling masses will pay far more in a depreciated wage check than a sales tax would ever cost them. It will not take a great deal of paper inflation to make a wage check worth 50 cents on the dollar. It will not take very much of printing-press inflation for the depreciated value of the wage check to be the equivalent of a 50-percent sales tax. Yet we hear it said that a small general manufacturers' sales tax is an unjust burden upon the masses of our people. Not so. The burden that is about to be heaped upon the masses of our people is that we are building up a national debt, permitting the credit of this country to go on the rocks, forcing a paper inflation upon this country, eventually, which will destroy the wage checks of this country. If the interests of no one were involved other than the interests of the great toiling masses, justice and wisdom would demand that it would be better to turn to a sales tax and meet this obligation than it would be to permit the credit of our country to sink, as it is sinking, until we are forced to turn to the ever-unwise expedient of just printing money to meet Government obligations.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman's statement about conditions as to wages and salaries is predicated upon an impairment of credit, which is followed by uncontrolled inflation. Does the gentleman think that the kind of speech he is making this afternoon is doing much to maintain or preserve the credit of this Government?

Mr. McGUGIN. I have always found that it is better to have the courage to tell the truth as one sees it, to the people of a democracy, rather than to blind them and lead them on to false hopes.

Mr. KVALE. I do not question the gentleman's courage. All of the gentleman's colleagues realize the gentleman has an abundance of courage, but sometimes we question the wisdom or the completeness of some of his utterances.

Mr. McGUGIN. I think the best thing that could happen to this country would be for the entire 126,000,000 people to understand that this Government has increased its debt 100 percent in 4 years; that this Government has operated with an unbalanced Budget for 4 years, and that this only leads to destroyed Government credit, and that the price of this in the end is depreciated money, which means the ruin of the people. It always has, and it always will. No; I think that the trouble today is that the people of our country do not realize the truth. I believe the great American people are courageous; and if they realize the truth, they would come to the rescue of their Government and would demand that the Budget be balanced, and a great part of those now demanding money from the Government would cease demanding money from the Government, because many of the demands have no justification whatever other than this—somebody else is getting it, and I am going to get mine. Such a race to bleed the Public Treasury, if not halted, runs directly to bankruptcy of government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman think that if everybody would pay his fair share of the taxes in this country, the situation would not be so bad as it is today? For example, one city in the Northwest, when the assessors got through they found, on personal property, money and credits to the amount of $105,000,000 valuation. When the authorities began to investigate, they came across some big concerns that owed several million dollars additional. When $8,000 was appropriated for an investigation and the new assessors went into an investigation, they found additional property amounting in all, with the amount I have stated, to $167,689,770, and they are still digging up more delinquent taxes in that great city in the Northwest.

The history of taxdodging by big business is always interesting because it shows exactly who has to bear this burden of taxation when the corporate interests dodge payment. In the State of Minnesota the city of Minneapolis distributes its tax collection in the following manner: One sixth to the revenue fund of the State, one sixth to the county of Hennepin, one third to the city of Minneapolis, and one third to the schools of Minneapolis. Just what does this prove? It means that the small taxpayer in order to have the services he expects from municipal government must be the victim of a boosted tax levy, or else go without proper lighting of streets, proper schools for children, proper maintenance generally of streets and departments of government, and such a curtailment of services means either going backward or help from the central government, be it either State or Federal. I say get at the taxdodger, make him pay his fair share of government cost for the service and protection he receives, fortify the laws and statutes against such practices and much of the evils of taxation will have been solved. The State of Minnesota under a Farmer-Labor Governor has gone far in bringing these dodgers to justice, and many of the millions of outstanding taxes rightfully due the State will be collected as a result of this forceful and progressive action on the part of the executive department of the State. Answer that question and it will take off some of the debt of this country.

Mr. McGUGIN. Of course, there is no defense for a taxdodger, but all the gentleman says does not apply to the Government of the United States. It does not apply to one iota of revenue that comes into the Treasury of the United States. Whether the people the gentleman mentions are paying their State taxes honestly or dishonestly does not make any difference as far as the Government of the United States is concerned. The Government of the United States has gone into debt $16,000,000,000 in 4 years, and it is going into debt 65 cents every time it spends a dollar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. My statement was an illustration of what happened in one city. I want to say that my own State is 26 percent delinquent in taxes. We have one county 81 percent tax delinquent. You have been talking about taxation, and there is one thing that the gentleman forgets, and that is the units. We go to the school districts and the school district fixes the rate of taxation. That is a small unit. A little larger unit is the township. Then we go to the county unit, and then to the State unit, and the condition is such that our people do not have anything to do with it.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am sorry for the situation in Minnesota if many of the citizens of the State are dishonest in meeting their tax burdens.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I was interested in the gentleman's statement about the sales tax, and the principal argument in favor of it is that it is universal, collected from everybody without exception, and it collects a tax in proportion to the person's ability to buy. Does not the gentleman believe that if we would amend the income tax law so it would be universal and collect taxes from everyone without exception, get a graduated income tax, that it would serve the purpose better than a sales tax?

Mr. McGUGIN. As far as the income tax is concerned, I am in favor of it. We have the income tax now. There are here and there some changes that should be made to bring in more revenue, but it is utterly impossible to get enough money out of the income tax to meet the expenses of the Government.

I am not in favor of a sales tax as a substitute for the income tax. I am in favor of a sales tax as the only available means left to get enough money to start to meet the expenses.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. What would the gentleman think of supplementing a net-income tax with a gross-income tax or a turn-over tax? It would have an advantage over the sales tax, inasmuch as it would impose a tax on that part of the gross income which does not represent purchases or turn-over.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am frank to say that I do not understand what the gentleman's question means.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. A gross-income tax, a tax on all income, without deduction.

Mr. McGUGIN. No matter how small an income a man makes?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Or no matter how large the income—a small percentage, one half of 1 percent, a flat percentage on all the gross income of all the citizens of the United States in addition to a tax upon the income, which would be graduated.

Mr. McGUGIN. As I understand it, that would be equivalent to, say, 1-percent tax on every transaction, would it not?

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Either one half of 1 percent or 1 percent upon all income derived by every individual or corporation in the United States, whether derived from the sale of a commodity, from salaries received, or from any source whatever.

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not know that I could answer the question as to how much it would bring in, as I have not had time to go into that phase of the matter at all.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The essential weakness of the sales tax is that it does not place any burden on that part of a person's income which is not spent. It seems to me that the unspent and unspendable part of an income should be taxed and is more entitled to be taxed than that which is spent.

Mr. McGUGIN. We have an income tax now with rates as high as 57 percent of income. If we did not have the income tax, I would agree with the gentleman. It seems to me the present income tax reaches the unspent income.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ARENS].

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, in closing the general debate on the measure before the House yesterday Mr. JONES, the very able chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, made the following statement:

> The men who stand on this floor and damn the man who has done something for the farmer and condemn everything that is offered because it is not offered in the form they want it are doing the farmer no service. I have heard for a generation people talk about doing something for the farmer. This is the first administration in a long time that has actually done something for the farmer, and one would think, to hear these gentlemen, that the administration is abusing them. It is possible for the people who represent industrial districts to lose sympathy with the agricultural interests.

While he made this statement, he was looking right straight and speaking to the Representatives from the middle-Northwestern States. He stated that the districts whose Representatives were not in accord with all the terms of this bill—namely, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa—had received more loans and had made more applications under the bill that we are amending today than any other district, giving the sum total of actual loans made.

This I believe is correct. We believe the President is earnest and sincere and his whole purpose is to help all the people, and especially the common people, including the farmer, and we believe and hope that the benefits of his program will reach us very soon.

We do not believe that the President can help us all at once. We also know that the President cannot give his personal attention to all legislation necessary. The gentleman from Texas must not expect that all of us should close our eyes and accept the measures drawn up by eastern professors relative to matters that affect our own welfare. Some of us know at least as much about our needs as those professors.

Conditions in our country as far as agriculture is concerned are more unsatisfactory today than they ever have been. I am glad the President's program has improved agricultural conditions in the South to a considerable extent, and I hope it will have the same effect in our territory.

I want to show you that conditions in our territory have not improved. The Federal Farm Loan Act has helped the South and West because, as the gentleman from Texas stated, the interest rates charged on farm mortgages in the West and the South were in most cases 10 percent. This bill is a godsend to those farmers. In Minnesota since 1923 the State rural credit bureau has charged the farmer 5¼ percent and placed $61,000,000 under those terms. Farmers paid to the banks from 5 to 6 percent on good farm-mortgage loans. Private people loaned money as low as 4 percent, and therefore the interest rate provided in this bill is hardly any improvement in our section. The main reason why this bill does not bring relief to those that need relief is on account of its appraisal section. Fifty percent of the normal value is loaned on land and 20 percent on buildings. In Minnesota half of the value of a farm is invested in buildings. We are required, because all our farm products are practically fed up to livestock, and livestock and dairy cattle have to be fed in the barns 7 months of the year, to build permanent and expensive buildings; and any farmer that only needs a loan amounting to 20 percent of the value of buildings and 50 percent of the normal value of land does not need help.

The State of Minnesota, under the Rural Credit Bureau Act, loaned 60 percent of the value of the land at the time when land values were high and 25 percent on buildings. The farmer who at the present time still has an equity in his farm of 50 percent of the normal value of the land and 20 percent of the buildings does not need help. For 10 years the farmers have produced below cost; and they have, in order to balance the budget, been compelled to borrow money, and most of them are in debt heavier than the amount permitted under this bill; and it will therefore not help them.

I voted for the bill yesterday because it shows some improvement, and improvements have been made in the administration of the act. In my county up to the 1st of November not a single loan had been made because of the strict adherence of the appraisers to the terms of the bill. Considerable complaint was made, and especially by the attorney for the district of which my county is a member. From that time on many farms have been reappraised and quite a number of loans granted. The fact that a large number of loans are now being made in my district is because there is no other agency in Minnesota where money on farm land could be had and all mortgages expiring could not be renewed. The Federal Government is getting the good mortgages of those farmers that really do not need any help, and it is true, as the chairman, Mr. JONES, said yesterday, that our district is making now a large number of loans. The week between Christmas and New Year's the Federal Land Bank of St. Paul had a notice in the paper that in one single day they loaned over $1,000,000. The bill we passed yesterday provides that an additional $600,000,000 can be loaned by the Commissioner up to 75 percent of the value of the land. This is quite an improvement, but we in our territory still insist that the interest rate is too high and it must come down on a parity with the price that the farmers in our section are receiving for their produce. It must come down to a level that the farmer can afford to pay, which should not exceed the amount provided in the Frazier bill.

The situation, as said before, in our section is not improving. We are in a section where our cash receipts are almost altogether from livestock. Live hogs have sold around the 3-cent mark per pound for the last 3 months, which is the lowest for many years. Beef cattle are still lower in proportion. A friend of mine sold no. 1 baby beef this year at 5½ cents per pound in south St. Paul for the same quality that he received 9½ cents a year ago.

Butterfat has been the lowest for 30 years for this time of the year and is bringing today, in my home town, 19 cents per pound. Poultry and eggs are lower, good poultry bringing about 5 and 6 cents a pound and eggs 14 cents a dozen for case run. Our receipts, on the average, are lower than they have ever been, and on top of that the N.R.A. and the benefit given under new legislation to the cotton and tobacco growers are adding to our cost of living. We pay more by 35 percent for clothing than we did in the past, and the processing tax has added to our woes.

A pair of overalls that I bought 6 months ago for $1.15 now cost me $1.85. Any article of wearing apparel that has cotton or wool, and all of it has, cost considerably more money. The N.R.A. has added to the cost of manufacture. The processing tax, as I stated, has not brought enough benefits to have a general effect. Our millers are paying 30 cents a bushel since it went into effect. The price in my home town for no. 1 wheat, of which we have not very much, has gone down from 90 cents a bushel to 70 cents a bushel. No. 1 patent flour today is $3.90 per hundredweight; it appears that a processing tax is taken off of the price of wheat, adding to the price of flour.

On the 7th of August 1907, No. 1 Northern wheat sold in my home town of Jordan at 91 cents a bushel and no. 1 patent flour sold at $2.75 per hundred pounds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman stated that butter fat in Minnesota today is 19 cents a pound.

Mr. ARENS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I want to say that the importation of coconut oil in recent years into this country, according to a report that I hold in my hand from Mr. O'Brien, the Chairman of the Federal Tariff Commission, is over 300,000,000 pounds a year. For the first 11 months of the past year it was slightly over 400,000,000 pounds, amounting to the sum of $5,475,000. That accounts for the fact that the gentleman and I, as dairy farmers, do not get very much for butterfat that we produce.

Mr. ARENS. I am, of course, talking about the processing tax, in that it does not benefit us in Minnesota.

We were hit by the processing tax coming and going. The processing tax on live hogs went into effect, I believe, September 1. Hogs were $4.65 a hundred in South St. Paul. Since that time packers gradually deducted the processing tax from the farmer in the price they pay for live hogs, and have brought it down to around 3 cents a pound; and in spite of that, when you go into the butcher shop in the Twin Cities you are told when you buy pork chops that the cause of the high price is the processing tax. It is interesting to note here that the balance sheet of the big packers for last year shows an enormous profit—the first time for several years—and I would be very much interested to see the balance sheet of the big millers. The benefit that was supposed to go to the farmer has been gathered in by the processor, the miller, and the packer.

Yes; we farmers in Minnesota have a reason to be alert and try to amend legislation so it will also affect us. We are still hopefully waiting that the new deal will bring relief to us. We still have confidence in Mr. Roosevelt and as a whole we are supporting his program.

However, improvements will have to come before the next election. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Has the gentleman any further speakers who desire to speak tonight?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Not at this time.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H.R. 6951, the Interior Department appropriation bill, had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL—FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I should like the attention of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] to make inquiry as to whether or not it will be agreeable to now fix some time for concluding general debate on tomorrow?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I have requests for about an hour and a half yet. We might cut it down a little, but I should like to have that much time on this side.

Mr. HASTINGS. Those in charge of legislation remind me that there is to be a caucus tomorrow at 4 o'clock, and they hope to be able to conclude this bill and pass it before that time. Would the gentleman be willing to close debate with 1 hour on a side tomorrow? There is no one here to go on this afternoon on either side.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. We will cooperate with the leadership of the House to facilitate things and try to do that.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the Interior Department appropriation bill shall close in 2 hours, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON] and the other half by the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, may I assume that each side has used an equal amount of time up to this time? I think there should be an understanding about a clear division of the time if that is not the case.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think we can take care of the requests on this side within the 1 hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL PLANNING NEEDED

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks upon a bill that I have introduced, seeking to set up a national planning commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, our Nation drifted into this awful depression through lack of foresight and patriotic planning. If those at the helm of our Nation in 1926, 1927, and 1928 had been looking forward, beyond their noses, they would have seen that an end was bound to come, and come soon, to the hectic period of speculation and frenzied finance. I do not claim to be an expert in either economics or in finance, but there is abundant evidence that I realized that we were then heading for the day of reckoning. I so informed many of my friends, and I am glad to say that some of them came in out of the storm before it was too late.

DEPRESSION WAS UNEXPECTED

But when the crash came, in October 1929, instead of standing up and facing the situation and taking corrective and remedial measures, the administration then in power stuck its head into the sand and repeated the vain assurance, "All is well." But all was not well, and matters continued to grow worse and worse week by week. Industry slowed up, men by the millions were dismissed from employment, banks began to fail, merchants began to be bankrupt, prices of farm commodities fell rapidly, farmers were unable to pay the interest on their mortgages, and soon conditions in the towns and cities were as bad or worse than they were on the farm. Yet the administration continued to drift and to flounder. Their thinking processes seemed paralyzed. They indulged the vain hope that somehow or other Providence would intervene and save the people. They said, "Let conditions right themselves." They argued that the Government should take no initiative to lift industry out of its bogs. They said that the Federal Government owed no duty to the people. They urged that the unemployed should be fed by private charity. If private charity should fail, then the local municipalities and the States alone should help. But the Federal Government, so they contended, should never lift its hand to spend one dollar to keep people from freezing, to save them from starving, or to give them any sort of living chance.

This condition grew worse and worse day by day, until finally, in the fall of 1930, the situation was so bad, and manifestly promised to become worse, that it bore heavily upon my heart and mind. Wherever I spoke I called attention to the dangers ahead. Finally, on October 25, 1930, I sent the following telegram to the President of the United States:

GREENVILLE, S.C., October 25, 1930.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States,
White House, Washington, D.C.:

I earnestly urge you to call Congress in extra session, to meet November 10, to provide material cooperation with the States and municipalities relieving distress due to unemployment. We fed the war sufferers of Europe during and after the war. Let charity end at home by helping the sufferers in our land from unemployment. The regular session would be too late to meet the whole situation. A real national emergency confronts us. This crisis could easily prove worse than war. Suggest you and your advisers outline program in advance and propose legislation to Congress first day of extra session and ask Congress to act swiftly. I have prepared relief plan and respectfully ask early appointment with your advisers. You should appeal to every patriot to volunteer to serve humanity by making real sacrifice of time and money. If we cannot banish poverty and if we cannot prevent unemployment, surely we can prevent death by starvation and freezing. I hereby volunteer to the full limit of my strength. Please wire if you desire me meet your advisers in conference.

Sincerely and respectfully,

JOHN J. McSWAIN,
Member of Congress.

So far as I now recall, I received no reply to that telegram. I then prepared a relief program and submitted it to the President and received no reply concerning that communication. The following is a summary of my views of a relief organization suitable to the conditions as they then existed:

The essence of the plan proposed by Mr. McSWAIN is to constitute a continuing reservoir of money at Washington to become available to meet an emergency at any time in any part of the country. As it is, money can only be taken from the Treasury Department by appropriation of Congress. Congress meets once a year and is oftentimes not in session when the emergency arises. Furthermore, some State legislatures meet only once in 2 years and a few only once in 4 years. Hence great suffering that cannot be completely met by the resources of the National Red Cross Society may be endured by thousands of innocent and helpless people. After the State legislature meets and after the Congress meets it is often too late to relieve the distressed and to prevent the suffering and death.

Under Mr. McSWAIN's plan the money will be available any day and the commission can meet on short notice and lend the money to the State or to the municipality without requiring technical compliance with law as to security. It would be an honor obligation of the State and of the municipality. It would not bear interest and would be payable within 10 years by installments. It is unthinkable that any State or any municipality would accept these funds and thereafter fail to repay them.

Another important feature of Mr. McSWAIN's plan is to use existing State agencies for the dispensation and administration of relief. These State agencies are in constant touch with the people and are familiar with local conditions. They will administer the relief without additional compensation. Therefore, the Federal Government will not have to set up an additional lot of machinery which would cost much money. The Federal Government merely advances the money and ultimately gets it back without interest, while the State is able to discharge its primary obligation of meeting the social and physical needs of its people. For example, the Governor of a State can use the State officers and the State constabulary and also use the county officers, such as sheriff, clerk of court, and probate judge; and these can investigate cases, distribute relief, and thus apply the money where it is needed and yet without cost to either the State or the Nation. These officers know the people and know who are deserving and know the extent of their suffering and can distribute relief much better than any stranger brought from Washington or anywhere else. In large cities, municipal organizations, through the mayor, would be called upon to administer the relief. The mayor would act through his police department, his fire department, and his street department; and they would thus easily cover the entire city and be able to apply the relief where it is needed, and thus the entire country can be inexpensively and yet efficiently kept under the superintending eye of the Federal Relief Commission.

Receiving no reply from either of the above communications, on November 15 I again wired the President of the United States, and the following is a copy of the news item relating to that telegram, which appeared in the Greenville Piedmont, an afternoon paper, published on November 15, 1930:

M'SWAIN THINKS ACTION MUST BE TAKEN BEFORE WINTER—POINTS OUT THAT SOUTH WILL SUFFER LESS THAN REMAINDER OF NATION; WANTS GENERAL PROGRAM

Congressman J. J. McSWAIN today wired President Hoover, repeating the offer made several weeks ago to assist in every possible way toward relieving the unemployment situation in the United States.

Congressman McSWAIN again pointed out that the approach of winter was certain to bring hardships in various parts of the country, and for this reason he feels that some action should be taken before that time. While the South will suffer less, keen want may be felt in this section, he believes.

Congressman McSWAIN's telegram to President Hoover follows:

"As one humble Democrat I promise full cooperation in every reasonable effort to restore business, reduce unemployment, and relieve distress. I repeat my offer to confer with your advisers and suggest plan of relief. Cold and wet weather over country reminds us dread winter will soon be gripping country. Great as suffering will be in South, other sections will be much worse. While primary duty of relief rests on States, they are financially unable to meet this responsibility. Suggest Federal Government assist through State agencies. This most economical and effective way. Hope you and your party leaders will be prepared to lay proposed measure before Congress on December 1. Congress should act before Christmas.

"Please exercise your power under flexible provisions of tariff law to make reductions and restore friendly buying of other nations and help work off our surplus. Veterans' Bureau should be instructed to rush examinations and ratings on disabled ex-soldiers in this emergency. Bureau doctors and employees should be asked to work faster and some overtime. We met a war crisis nobly. Let us meet a peace crisis equally well. Instruct all Government employees to open the throttle and turn on full head steam and rush all work. We must mobilize our energies and resources to relieve American citizens, as we proudly did to help Belgians, Germans, Russians, and many others. Action, and quick action, is demanded by the situation."

On March 17, 1931, I was suddenly stricken very ill and was incapacitated for work for several months. However, I was back at my office when Congress reconvened on the first Monday in December 1931, and on January 4, 1932, I introduced House Joint Resolution 170, seeking to set up a national advisory board to plan for the revival and rehabilitation of business in this Nation.

House Joint Resolution 170

Joint resolution authorizing the President to appoint a nonpartisan board of 25 members to study and report conclusions upon ways, means, and methods to rehabilitate business conditions

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and empowered to appoint 25 citizens of the United States to constitute the National Advisory Board, to be a nonpartisan body, representing all the sections, industries, interests, and businesses of the people of all parts of the United States. Five of said persons shall be appointed for 2 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for 8 years; and 5 of said persons for a term of 4 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for a term of 6 years; and 5 of said persons shall be appointed for a term of 6 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for a term of 4 years; and 5 of said persons for a term of 8 years, and their successors immediately thereafter appointed for a term of 2 years; and 5 of said persons shall be appointed for a term of 10 years, and if any of such persons die, resign, or become otherwise disqualified, the President shall, if necessary, remove them from office and appoint their successors for the unexpired portion of the term involved. All of said persons shall serve without any salary, or commission, or compensation, but shall receive the actual expenses of travel and subsistence while attending the meetings of the board, or the meetings of any subcommittee lawfully appointed by the board. Immediately after the President shall notify the persons of their appointments under this act he shall set a time and place for a meeting for organization, and when not less than 10 such persons shall meet, they shall organize by electing 1 of their number as chairman, and 4 of their number as vice chairmen, and by electing 1 of their number as secretary, and all warrants and expenses herein authorized shall be drawn upon the Treasurer of the United States by the chairman, or by 1 of the vice chairmen, duly authorized, and countersigned by the secretary of the board.

SEC. 2. After the board shall organize it shall proceed to carry out the powers and duties hereinafter outlined, and shall appoint an executive committee of 5 members, and subcommittees, consisting of not less than 3 nor more than 5 members thereof, to consider international trade, infranational trade, manufacturers, agriculture, banking, finances, and exchanges, building industries and home ownership, education, carriers by rail, by highway, by water, and by air, and all carriers of intelligence, and of such other subjects as shall appear to the board to be expedient.

SEC. 3. For the first year of the life of the board it shall meet every 3 months at such places as the board may decide on at the next previous meeting, except that the President of the United States shall designate the time and place of the first meeting. Thereafter the board shall meet annually at a time and place fixed by the executive committee, and the attendance of 10 members shall be necessary to constitute a quorum to transact business binding members not present, but a smaller number than 10 may consider the business before the board and make recommendations by mail to all the members thereof not present, and shall consider them at the next meeting.

SEC. 4. The said board shall make an annual report in writing to the President of the United States on or before December 1 of each and every year, and the President shall transmit said report, together with any statistics or information that may be submitted along with the report, to the Congress of the United States. The board is authorized to employ clerical services, to organize a secretariat, and to purchase necessary stationery and office equipment, and to incur printing bills, and appropriations by the Congress not exceeding $25,000 a year are hereby authorized.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Department of Commerce is hereby authorized to furnish office space and such clerical assistance and office equipment as he conveniently can for the use of the board, and the President of the United States is authorized to detail the services of any officer, agent, or employee of the Government of the United States from any department to the board to assist the board in carrying on its work. Furthermore, the board shall have power to demand assistance and services from any executive or independent office or bureau of the United States Government, and it shall be the duty of such Federal agency to comply with such demand, unless excused from doing so by order of the President of the United States. The board is authorized to request information and statistics from State governments and subdivisions thereof, and from any private source, and to use the information and statistics so obtained in its studies as hereinafter contemplated.

SEC. 6. It shall be the duty and purpose of said board to study and to report conclusions upon ways, means, and methods to rehabilitate business conditions in the United States, and to place the same upon a sound, stable, and permanent basis of prosperity. Said board may make recommendations as to the coordination of various branches of industry, agriculture, mining, lumbering, and of the other activities constituting the business of the Nation, and this coordination shall have in view the condition of commerce and business in and with the other nations of the world.

Again on March 9, 1933, I introduced House Joint Resolution 24 to the same effect, and the same is now pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I sincerely believe that if my original suggestion to call a session of Congress in the early fall of 1930 had been acted upon, and if at that session remedial legislation such as was sponsored by the leading Democrats, including Vice President Garner and Senator Wagner, had been acted upon favorably, our people would have been saved much of the suffering and distress that they have had to undergo. It will be recalled that President Hoover vetoed the Wagner-Garner bill, which would have greatly enlarged the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to enable it to save many private business concerns and to give work and employment to hundreds of thousands of people in the construction of useful and desirable public buildings throughout the Nation.

PROSPERITY IS RETURNING

Mr. Speaker, it is true that we are manifestly on the upgrade, and that prospects are bright for a complete recovery to the normal business conditions in the next year or two. But the necessity for a planning board still remains. We should have watchmen upon the towers of our industrial citadel, constantly looking to the front to report conditions, to give advice, and to regulate and govern the major energies of our people. Perhaps a better figure of speech would be that we should have watchmen on the prow of the ship of state, looking intently forward as the ship advances, warning of reefs, shallows, storms, and guiding and advising the master of the ship.

STABILIZATION POSSIBLE ONLY BY RATIONAL PLANNING

Unless we do adopt some such national advisory board, consisting of patriotic and clear-headed men taken from all ranks of life, then it may be that in a few years we shall relapse into the same disorganized and distressing condition from which we are making heroic efforts to emerge. We stumbled into this condition through lack of foresight. We are using conscious and deliberate measures to extract ourselves. But when we shall have struggled out, unless we use the same good sense, the same foresight, and the same close study to keep ourselves advised, then we may repeat the same tragic error and again flounder in the depths of despair. We owe it to ourselves, but more especially do we owe it to our children, to prevent the recurrence of such conditions. If we have the intelligence that we think we have, and if we will combine our thinking and cooperate as patriotic and fair-minded people should, we should be able to avert the repetition of this awful state of affairs. With this in mind, I have been urging at all times the setting up of this national planning commission composed of some of the ablest and most unselfish men in the Nation, believing that they can save us from much of the suffering that we would otherwise endure.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. McDUFFIE (at the request of Mr. BANKHEAD), indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. BROOKS, for the balance of the week, on account of illness.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

A concurrent resolution to memorialize the Congress of the United States to provide credit relief for property owners in drainage districts which have defaulted in their bonded obligations

Whereas a number of the drainage districts in this State have made default in the payment of their bonded indebtedness; and

Whereas the property owners in these districts are being denied the privileges now being extended to others in refinancing their indebtedness under the Emergency Farm Loan Act of 1933, and all other agencies extended to home owners and farms set up under Federal authority: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That this exigency be called to the attention of the Congress to the end that provision be made for refinancing such bonded indebtedness on a basis commensurate with the ability of the property to pay in order that persons owning property in such districts be extended the privilege of obtaining loans for the purposes now authorized by the Emergency Farm Loan Act of 1933, and any and all other credit agencies set up under and by virtue of Federal authority.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the clerk of both Houses in Congress, to both Senators from this State, and to the Members of Congress of this State.

Adopted January 10, 1934.

House concurrence, January 11, 1934.

A true copy.

[SEAL] VERA HOUSEAL,
Journal Clerk of South Carolina Senate.

A concurrent resolution memorializing the Members of Congress of the United States to interest themselves in preparing and endeavoring to secure the passage of such legislation as might be necessary and/or utilizing the benefits of such legislation as might already exist for obtaining from the United States Government assistance in improving the economic status of agriculture in South Carolina and for the economic and social betterment of the rural citizenship of this State by making it possible for the worthy nonlandowning farm operators to become landowners

Whereas 65 percent of the farms and 59 percent of the cultivated lands of South Carolina are operated by nonlandowners; and

Whereas there are in South Carolina many farms too large for efficient operation and are therefore an economic burden to the present owners; and

Whereas such land would render greater service to the operators and to society as a whole if operated as farm units of an economic size; and

Whereas many of the owners of the large farms are willing to sell their lands at a fair price and many worthy nonlandowning farm operators are desirous of buying farms but are now financially unable to acquire an equity necessary to enable them to finance the purchase through existing credit agencies; and

Whereas, because of the distressing conditions of farm life in this State for the past few years, many farmers have abandoned their farms and many of them have moved into the cities and towns, thereby increasing the number of unemployed; and

Whereas we believe that to go back to the land and build up the back country is the only way in which our people can get permanent relief; that the wealth is in the soil, which must be extracted before benefits can be derived therefrom, therefore the strongest nations in the world are those whose citizens live on the land and own their own homes. Home owners are usually satisfied people, industrious, peaceful, and successful farmers. The soundest economic and social conditions cannot be obtained where a large proportion of the land is operated by nonlandowners; and

Whereas we believe that great economic and social benefits would be derived if farm lands were acquired by the Government, cut up into small farms of 40 and 50 acres, with small homes on them and stock to work with, furnished at a reasonable price to worthy nonlandowning farmers. This could be done in a satisfactory way by the expenditure of something like $1,000 or less for each farmer and the operator being given something like 20 or 30 years to pay it back at a small rate of interest: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That this exigency be called to the attention of the Congress of the United States to the end that provision be made for:

1. The perfection of a plan to be cooperatively participated in by the United States and the State of South Carolina whereby farms may be bought at a fair price and resold on long-time payment in economic units to worthy farm operators who are at the time nonlandowners; or devise a plan whereby the worthy farm operators who do not at the time own land might more readily purchase lands directly from owners of same; or perfect any other plan whereby worthy farm operators who do not at the time own lands and do not have sufficient funds with which to purchase same, may acquire a small home.

Enlisting the assistance of the Department of Agriculture of the United States, and any other department, bureau, office, board, or commission in studying this problem to the end that it might be determined with reasonable accuracy the amount of land now held in large farms and which might be purchased at a fair price, and a number of worthy nonlandowning farm operators who could and would avail themselves of an opportunity of purchasing farms on a long-time payment plan.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Clerk of both Houses in Congress, both United States Senators from this State, and to the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States from this State.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the South Carolina House of Representatives and concurred in by the South Carolina Senate.

J. WILSON GIBBES,
Clerk of the House.

COLUMBIA, S.C., January 15, 1934.

ACTIVITIES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—ADDRESS BY ATTORNEY GENERAL CUMMINGS

As in legislative session,

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, on January 10 the Honorable Homer Cummings, Attorney General of the United States, made a very notable address over the radio on the Activities of the Department of Justice. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen, this is the second opportunity I have had to address you through the courtesy of the National Radio Forum and the Washington Star. On the first occasion (which occurred last April) I sought to describe the functions of the Department of Justice and certain purposes I had in mind. I repeat now, as I said then, that "the Department of Justice belongs to the people of America; it is their servant, ministering to their needs, and I bespeak for it the support and the good opinion of all law-abiding citizens."

Surely, I could not have expected more loyal and generous support than I have received. Ten busy months have passed rapidly by and during that period the various State and municipal authorities, the newspapers of the country, and the people as a whole, have given the Department of Justice such frank and wholehearted cooperation that our work, though difficult and exacting, has been stimulated and, indeed, made inspiring.

The intensive campaign against kidnapers, racketeers, and other predatory criminals, which was commenced last March, has made distinct and gratifying progress. In the 20 kidnapings reported, the Division of Investigation, under the very capable leadership of J. Edgar Hoover and in cooperation with State authorities, has achieved a solution in every instance. I do not know what the future may hold, but thus far we have not recorded a single failure. Forty-three persons have been convicted and 20 are in custody awaiting trial. The sentences imposed include 1 death sentence, 10 life sentences, and aggregate terms of imprisonment amounting to 405 years.

The Department has not been content to rely solely upon the kidnaping statute, but has used every available weapon in combating this despicable type of crime. In the case of Charles F. Urschel, of Oklahoma City, the total of 15 convictions (6 of which were for life) included convictions of persons who had given refuge and counsel to the actual kidnapers. Indicative of the far-flung character of these offenses it should be noted that the Urschel kidnaping occurred in the State of Oklahoma, the victim was held captive in a remote rural section of Texas, the ransom money was paid in Missouri, a portion of the ransom money was exchanged in Minnesota, another portion was hidden in Texas, one of the guilty parties was located in Colorado, and the others in Tennessee, Minnesota, Texas, and Illinois. These seven States have an area of about 683,000 square miles, which exceeds in extent the combined area of Austria, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, Holland, Switzerland, England, Scotland, and Wales. This particular case, which carried our agents into 16 States (Texas, Arkansas, Oklahoma, Colorado, Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York), could not have been handled successfully without the effective and loyal cooperation of the local authorities. In this instance, as in many others, special agents of the Division of Investigation offered to and received from the State authorities wholesome, friendly, and reciprocal help. Through this policy, which is one of cardinal importance, and one upon which we have insisted from the beginning, we were able to coordinate the activities of the law-enforcement officials in such a way that in a short time, and with the greatest economy of effort, the guilty parties were brought to justice.

The Division of Investigation has also been called upon to function in the enforcement of the so-called "Extortion Act", which has for its primary purpose the punishment of persons sending anonymous or unsigned communications through the mails threatening kidnaping, injury, or death for the purpose of extortion. In 33 such cases, the perpetrators have been convicted or are in custody awaiting trial. Twenty-nine convictions have been secured and 16 persons are in custody. Sentences of imprisonment aggregating 225 years have been imposed.

The dramatic and sensational features usually incident to criminal cases naturally attract a great deal of public attention. It is only fair, therefore, to stress the fact that such matters constitute but a small fraction of the work of the Department of Justice.

In numbers of opinions rendered, new legislation, and Executive orders reviewed, and in many other phases of civil activity including gold hoarding, N.R.A. matters, tax cases, land condemnations, customs matters, and the vast realm of Government litigation, this Department has been called upon in the last 10 months to undertake a hitherto unparalleled volume of work.

Last year, amongst other functions, it was our duty to enforce the Volstead Act. Today a very different problem is presented. The Federal Government is no longer called upon to enforce a law which, in many sections of the country at least, did not have the support of public opinion; but it still remains the duty of the Government to protect the dry States from the illegal importation of liquor. The Webb-Kenyon Act, the Reed amendment, and the terms of the twenty-first amendment impose obligations which cannot and should not be avoided. This duty we accept and intend to discharge, so far as the available appropriations will permit. On December 5, when the prohibition amendment was repealed, 11 States had constitutional prohibition and 17 more had drastic laws preventing the sale of intoxicants. These 28 States are clearly entitled to the support of the Federal Government in enforcing any laws on this subject which they may see fit to enact.

Another important matter arising since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment has to do with the protection of the revenue derived from taxes imposed upon intoxicating beverages. This is primarily a function of the Treasury Department, but one in which the Department of Justice, at the present time, is cooperating. This activity is one of the highest consequence.

Our people are in the midst of a heroic effort to pull our country out of the depression. The Federal Government is pushing forward with its program, eliminating costly and unfair trade practices, upholding fair wages and hours, banning child labor, aiding the small home owner to hold his family together under his own roof, helping the farmer to get a fairer price for the fruits of his toil, employing the jobless in public work, and in relieving distress. Fine men and women are giving their services unselfishly to this great cause.

Revenue is needed to balance the Budget and advance the program of recovery. A substantial part of the amount needed can and should be collected in the form of taxes on intoxicants. If the American people, instead of buying from bootleggers or others who seek to defraud the Government, will purchase from qualified and law-abiding dealers they will be performing a plain but imperative duty. Any citizen who, at this hour, seeks to cheat his Government is not only unpatriotic but he is cheating himself and his neighbors. Disregard of law in this matter is a gross breach of faith with his fellow citizens.

Unfortunately, we are still in an era of lawlessness and violence. Its manifestations are evident to the most casual observer. Of late there has been a tendency on the part of some of our people to countenance the actions of mobs that have taken into their own hands the punishment and, indeed, the murder of persons suspected or accused of crime.

It is unthinkable that anyone in possession of his faculties, who grasps the significance of our heritage of liberty, could condone mob violence; and inconceivable that anyone familiar with the long struggle for the establishment of equality before the law and the right of trial by a jury could speak without loathing of the inexcusable crime of lynching. To break down our law is to betray the Government and to make the tasks of our law-enforcing agencies far more difficult.

Round-about us in our civic and community life is the bond of fraternity—the law; in our social relationships the bond of fellowship—the law; in our economic and industrial activities the established standards of time, of value, of weight, of measure—the law; in our personal conduct the levels of honesty, integrity, morality—the law; and in our conflicts with evil and violence, there are the protecting processes of justice—again, the law.

All this is lost and swallowed up in the blood lust and passion of mob violence. Is it not time that we made ourselves once more a Nation of law-abiding citizens? The moment is opportune. Our Federal courts, long clogged with a type of criminal cases suitable only for police courts, have been freed from a distressing heritage. They can now turn their attention to the reform of their cumbersome and antiquated procedure, so that justice may be far swifter and far surer.

The courts and the bar, with the aid of the people, should be able to purge the legal profession of scavenger lawyers who degrade their calling and so frequently bridge the gap between respectability and crime. The evil consequences of these interwoven alliances are manifest upon every hand. Far too long an entrenched and instructed underworld has been permitted to lay tribute upon decent citizens and honest industry. The time has come for a renaissance of law and orderly government. In this vital matter you will have, to the last ounce of my energy, the services and the help of the Department of Justice.

THE SECURITY OF THE HOME OWNER AND BUSINESS RECOVERY—ADDRESS BY SENATOR O'MAHONEY

As in legislative session,

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, on Thursday, January 11, the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] delivered over the National Broadcasting Co. network an address on the Security of the Home Owner and Business Recovery, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The home owner is still the bulwark of society, just as the production of food, clothing, and shelter is still the very basis of our economic system. Toward the permanent reestablishment of these three fundamental pursuits of mankind every effort of the administration is being directed. Encouraging as has been the progress to date, it goes without saying that complete success cannot be achieved without the whole-hearted cooperation of all elements of our population. Because of the importance of enlisting this cooperation, I have been happy tonight to accept the invitation of the Home Owners' Protective Enterprise to discuss briefly the program which has been advanced by that organization to direct the flow of private capital once again into the channel of the construction and maintenance of private homes.

It remains just as true today as it was when Thomas Jefferson uttered his immortal aphorism, "That Government is best which governs least." There come great crises in human affairs such as that from which we are now beginning to emerge when it becomes necessary for government to assume broad and far-reaching powers. When the emergency is served the powers should be laid aside, but to bring about this result the means must be found to stimulate to reactivity the normal functions of private enterprise.

Because of the withdrawal of private funds from the field of home construction and maintenance, the administration brought into action the Home Owners' Loan Corporation as an emergency relief organization to bridge the gap, so to speak, occasioned by the practically complete collapse of the ordinary agencies engaged in this activity. Commendable as has been the work of this arm of the Government and great as its progress has been in the campaign to save the homes of the Nation to their owners, the most important task still lies ahead—namely, to revive every local agency which plays a part in the maintenance of homes.

It is not enough to protect citizens in the ownership of their dwellings. It is not sufficient to create a Government corporation to carry home mortgages. This merely prevents loss through foreclosure. We must go a step farther and find the way to promote positive action in the construction of new housing. How better can this end be achieved than to begin now a campaign, such as suggested by the Home Owners' Protective Enterprise, to promote the immediate repair and improvement of the homes we have?

Repair and improvement now will lead to construction later, and this first step, if promptly and courageously taken by home owners, business men, and bankers, cannot fail to revive not only the labor market but the market for capital goods as well. More than that, this plan, it seems to me, will go a very long way toward restoring the credit system of the country, the collapse of which has been the chief cause of so many so-called "inflationary proposals."

The family dwelling represents our most important national asset judged by any standard of measurement. Its ethical asset as the visible embodiment of family life is universally conceded. The human misery that rode the flood tide of foreclosed homes stirred the very depts of human sympathy. But limited time—not lack of appreciation—compels me to pass over, with a mere reference, both ethical asset and human misery, for my message concerns primarily business leaders and home owners, as men and women confronted with a business problem for the solution of which they have a joint obligation. Let me rivet your attention on the fact that the money invested in the dwellings that shelter our more than 29,000,000 American families amounts to $107,000,000,000—more than the entire capital investment in the roadbeds and equipment of all our railways plus the total funds expended for the buildings and operating machinery of all the Nation's industries, including its vast utility plants.

None will challenge the statement that protecting from further injury such an investment, owned by millions of the Nation's citizens, is fundamentally important to national economic recovery.

There is not a community in the land in which there are not scores of dwellings which are now sadly in need of repairs and reconditioning. New paint, new wall paper, new roofs, new doors, new fences, new steps, new walks, new chimneys, an addition here, a little remodeling there, all of these affording much needed opportunities for employment to skilled artisans, and an immediate market for building materials of all kinds. It requires no imagination to realize what renewed energy would be exhibited in every avenue of business if there could be developed now a demand for the materials and labor necessary for such a campaign of home improvement. No one has failed to observe the beneficial effects of the Public Works and Civil Works programs. The immediate results of the latter under the amazingly efficient direction of Harry Hopkins have been apparent everywhere. Similar results await the Nation-wide adoption of the program of the Home Owners Protective Enterprise; similar results and something more, the reestablishment of private enterprise with private capital, which, after all, is the primary essential of permanent recovery.

Public funds will start the pendulum, but private funds will wind the clock.

Simply stated, the proposal is the encouragement of small liquid, low-cost second-mortgage loans by private agencies for such home reconditioning, and, where needed, for the curtailment of existing mortgages. Because the whole credit structure of the country has been paralyzed by fear, it is proposed to ask the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or some other duly authorized Government agency, to support the loans by affording rediscount privileges under proper regulation to the holders of the paper. Thus at one and the same time would be obtained the security that comes from the certainty of Government cooperation and the restoration of a confident self-reliant attitude on the part of the private agencies normally engaged in this sort of enterprise.

It is my understanding that these reconditioning loans are not to be confined to second-mortgage securities. It is only because the numbers of homes already carrying first mortgages have grown into so many millions and so many hundreds of thousands of them are confronted with demands for curtailment that relatively small results would follow from confining the home reconditioning and stabilization program to unencumbered homes or to those on which the amount of the first mortgage could be increased to provide the necessary funds.

It is proposed that the proceeds of the loans should be rigidly restricted to the stabilization of existing mortgages and to repairs and improvements. The extension and stabilization of first mortgages would replace the home owner's sense of uncertainty and fear with one of security and hope. The curtailment of first mortgages would enhance the security of the mortgage holder and start a return flow of first-mortgage capital for reinvestment. The physical improvement of the dwellings, increasing as it would, the home owner's equity, would inevitably tone up the family morale and provide a demand for natural and constructive reemployment.

Until the great disaster of the last few years overtook us we were accustomed to call ourselves the wealthiest, the most prosperous, the most powerful Nation that has ever existed on the face of the globe. Whatever truth there was in that satisfactory feeling of national superiority arose from the fact that in the United States we have always felt that every individual is entitled to a full and complete share in the luxuries a bounteous nature provides. The prosperity which came from mass production really came from mass consumption. It was because every family wanted an automobile or a radio, good clothing, good food, entertainment, and education that the market was created which enabled productive industry to operate on a scale never before known. Among other reasons, it was because we could not keep this demand alive and active that the collapse came. Now our problem is to re-create this demand and to provide for the widespread distribution among all our people of all the products of industry and invention.

During the generation following the war between the States, the construction of the vast network of American railroads created the demand for labor and materials which caused the prosperity of those days. Later the manufacture of automobiles created a similar market and brought a similar prosperity. All through history prosperity has followed in the wake of some great enterprise which engaged the attention of most of the people.

To what enterprise could we as a people turn now with better prospect of creating the necessary market for labor and material than toward the building of better homes?

Improved standards of living necessarily mean better business. There is no way to bring about such an improvement that could possibly be more successful than to arouse a Nation-wide determination to improve the homes of the Nation.

Slum clearance and subsistence housing, now promoted by the Government, constitute an important factor in this movement, but Government action alone will not save the people. We must safe ourselves by our individual action. It is my conviction that this is so, that has prompted me tonight to join in this appeal to the business men of the country to give thought to this project which may at first thought seem unimportant. It is not unimportant. It is fundamental.

My suggestion to business men and investors is that they examine the principle and method of this project; that they make known their conclusions concerning both the project and the importance which they attach to the pending request for cooperation from the R.F.C. and the Department of Commerce.

To the home owners let me say this: It is my understanding that the Home Owners' Protective Enterprise is anxious that all other noncommercial independent home-owner organizations join in the support of this project. It is only through organization that home owners can express themselves forcefully and manage effectively their common and collective interests. I suggest that organized groups of home owners everywhere let their judgments and suggestions be known for the guidance of those who will have the responsibility of leadership in the proposed campaign.

Address your comments to the Home Owners' Protective Enterprise, Barr Building, Washington, D.C.

And thank you; good night.

THE FEDERAL SECURITIES ACT

As in legislative session,

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, last Friday I obtained unanimous consent to incorporate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an advance reprint of an article in the Atlantic Monthly replying to attacks on the Federal Securities Law. This earliest legislative result of the stock-exchange investigation by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee merits further discussion, and no one is more competent to present the subject accurately and philosophically than the distinguished Harvard law professor who was largely responsible for the form and substance of that congressional enactment.

In the magazine Fortune for August 1933 Prof. Felix Frankfurter has, with customary care and understanding, analyzed the Federal securities law. I ask leave to have his discussion printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Reprinted from Fortune for August 1933]

THE FEDERAL SECURITIES ACT

By Felix Frankfurter

"He who is unwilling to assume the responsibility of a fiduciary has no business to be a fiduciary."

Legislation is not anticipation. It is a response, too often a laggard response, to serious need. The new Federal Securities Act is a belated and conservative attempt to curb the recurrence of old abuses which, through failure of adequate legislation, had attained disastrous proportions. How to draw the savings of people into great streams of investment and at the same time to protect those savings from recklessness has been a problem for statesmanship ever since the advent of large corporate enterprise. Particularly exigent has this problem been in periods of crisis following speculative debauches. Man's memory is short, and hope of gain is an obdurate motive. When, however, confidence takes flight, it can be coaxed to return permanently only by prudent safeguards against future devastation.

I

Protection of investors has a long legislative history on both sides of the Atlantic. This is not the place to recount it. Differences in national pattern are more complicated than appears from a comparison of individual threads in national textures. And yet it is fair to say that England has been quicker and wiser to act on its experience of cupidity and carelessness than we have been. A summary account of the English story will give the Rayburn-Fletcher Act its proper perspective.

As early as the late seventeenth century, in 1696, commissioners appointed to look into the trade of England reported as follows:

"The pernicious art of stock jobbing hath of late so perverted the end and design of companies and corporations erected for the introducing or carrying on of manufactures to be the private profit of the first projectors that the privileges granted to them have commonly been made no other use of by the first procurers and subscribers, but to sell again, with advantage, to ignorant men, drawn in by reputation, falsely raised and artfully spread, concerning the thriving state of their stock. Thus the first undertakers, getting quit of the company by selling their shares for much more than they are really worth to men allured by the noise of great profit, the management of that trade and stock comes to fall into unskillful hands, whereby the manufacturers, intended to be provided by such grants and put into the management of companies for their better improvement, come from very promising beginnings to dwindle away to nothing, and be in a worse condition than if they were perfectly left free and unassisted with such laws or patents; an instance whereof, we humbly conceive, is to be found in the paper and linen manufactures, which, we fear, feel the effects of this stock-jobbing management and are not in so thriving a condition as they might have been had they not fallen under this kind of misfortune."

After the great South Sea bubble had burst, Parliament, in 1720, passed the so-called "Bubble Act." Its provisions were so severe—it virtually aimed at the suppression of all joint-stock trading—that it remained a dead letter until after the Napoleonic wars, when the mania for speculation again gave rise to fraudulent stock jobbing. Subsequent legislation had whittled down the Bubble Act, and it was finally repealed in 1825. But corporate enterprise grew, and with it the need for adequate control. In 1844 a Select Committee on Joint Stock Companies, under the chairmanship of Gladstone, then the young Tory president of the board of trade, made a notable report. Adequate means for knowledge on the part of the investing public was the basic insight which the Gladstone committee drew from its investigation. "Periodical accounts, if honestly made and fairly audited, cannot fail to excite attention to the real state of a concern; and by means of improved remedies, parties to mismanagement may be made more amenable for acts of fraud and illegality. * * * The early publication, resulting from registration of * * * prospectuses and circulars, will doubtless be useful in controlling * * * undertakings at their outset * * *." The Companies Act of 1844 enacted the recommendation of the Gladstone committee for registration of prospectuses. Unfortunately, Gladstone's insistence on the importance of periodical accounts has as yet not been fully accepted even in British practice, nor was complete disclosure of the essential facts in the offering circular made obligatory in English law for many years. The Companies Act of 1844 was merely a beginning. It introduced the principle of compulsory disclosure, but its effectuation through requisite details was an evolutionary process. More than 20 years elapsed before the law exacted any requirements as to the contents of the prospectus. By the Companies Act of 1867 the prospectus had to disclose every contract made previous to the issue of a prospectus. But this provision was emasculated by permitting subscribers to waive compliance.

These legislative gestures in due course proved inadequate. And so, under the Companies Act of 1900, thoroughgoing specific disclosures, duly defined in the act and without right of waiver of compliance, had to be furnished by the prospectus. These requirements came into English law as the result of authoritative inquiries into the workings of the previous companies acts. Bearing upon our immediate problem, Lord Davey's committee reported as follows:

"* * * It must be generally acknowledged that a person who is invited to subscribe to a new undertaking has practically no opportunity of making any independent inquiry before coming to a decision. Indeed, the time usually allowed between the issue of the prospectus and the making of an application does not permit of any real investigation. The maxim of caveat emptor has in the opinion of your committee but a limited application in such cases.

"It is therefore of the highest importance that the prospectus upon which the public are invited to subscribe shall not only not contain any misrepresentation but shall satisfy a high standard of good faith. It may be a counsel of perfection and impossible of attainment to say that a prospectus shall disclose everything which could reasonably influence the mind of an investor of average prudence. But this, in the opinion of your committee, is the ideal to be aimed at, and for this purpose to secure the utmost publicity is the end to which new legislation on the formation of companies should be directed."

Human nature does not vary greatly with geography, and Englishmen also have been known to chafe under tighter control of dangerous business practices. The detailed disclosures required by the act of 1900 were deemed mischievous by many bred in the old habits. The lawyers supported instead of soothed their clients' fears. Complaining to the company law amendment committee, which sat in 1905, under the chairmanship of Lord Loreburn, the Council of the Incorporated Law Society objected to the elaborate provisions of section 10 of the Companies Act of 1900 as to the content of prospectuses offering shares: "The provisions of this section are in many cases found most irksome and many of them are, it is believed, of little practical benefit to the public." But the Loreburn committee recommended only minor changes in this part of the companies law which were incorporated in the Companies Act of 1907 and reenacted by sections 80 and 81 of the Companies Act of 1908.

The Lord Wrenbury committee in 1918 recommended no changes in the prospectus law, while the Greene committee in 1926 found "the existing law with regard to prospectuses * * * on the whole satisfactory", adding:

"No evidence was given before us to justify any relaxation of the law in this respect except in one minor particular. * * * The statutory requirements are strict, and in some cases no doubt may prove unnecessarily onerous, but we consider that the public should continue to receive the protection which it at present enjoys."

Indeed, the committee reported that the law relating to prospectuses, instead of being relaxed, should be strengthened:

"We consider that the public is entitled to be told the facts which are obviously most relevant for it to know. Their suppression is calculated to mislead the unwary; and although instances may occur where nondisclosure might be justified in view of some exceptional circumstance, we think that even here the public has a right to a full disclosure upon which it can form its own judgment."

And so the committee recommended the inclusion of additional data regarding dividends and earnings and strongly urged that the use of "abridged prospectuses" be abolished entirely. These recommendations were incorporated in the Companies Act of 1928, and are now found in sections 34 and 35 and the fourth schedule of the Companies Act of 1929.

These requirements in English law, however stiff they may have appeared at the time of their innovation, have established themselves as the accepted and respected conventions of English business. Today English opinion would not countenance relaxation of the rigors of the British prospectus law. It has strengthened the indispensable condition for investments—confidence of the investor. In a recent review of the operations of the Companies Act of 1929, the London Economist, the leading organ of English finance, thus spoke of the prospectus law: "Experience would probably show that the new act, despite its shortcomings, has made the company-issue market an appreciably safer place for the investor."

II

Against this background of British experience the American Securities Act of 1933 must be projected. Like most legislation, it did not spring full-grown; it grew. But like much American legislation, corrective of industrial and financial excesses, it grew in the hard, uncongenial soil of romantic individualism. Twenty years ago Mr. (now Mr. Justice) Brandeis made an impressive analysis of the workings of our financial forces and of the traps and pitfalls that beset the investor. He reminded his readers of the legislative advances already made in England. But in calling for full and complete disclosure in the intricate business of marketing securities his was a voice in the wilderness.

The war came, and after it "normalcy." Not only did admonitions of the English experience go unheeded, we improved upon our own history of financial exuberance. In an era when Government and industry blithely sponsored the magic of a "new plateau of prices", even old-fashioned investment houses abandoned what were deemed outmoded traditions and moved onto a new plateau of recklessness. The story is a thrice-told tale of which we must not weary if we are to act on its disastrous meaning. During the height of the greatest speculative carnival in the world's history, billions of new securities were floated, of which a large part had no relation to the country's need and which inevitably became worthless; worthless not merely for millions who had sought speculative gains but for those other millions who sought to conserve the savings of a lifetime. By all the subtle and mesmerizing arts of modern salesmanship, the sellers of securities had so extended the field of security buyers that 55 percent of all savings, according to a reliable estimate, went into publicly marketed securities. The resulting losses cut from under the basic supports of a considerable portion of the population, and especially of those helplessly dependent on income from savings. The enormous, easy profits from their distribution stimulated the creation and sale of billions in securities, which have burdened industry and wasted or misdirected the capital resources of the Nation. The Alleghany Corporation, to cite a single example, sold $150,000,000 of securities to the public not to build railroads but to finance without risk to its promoters their reckless speculation in already dangerously pyramided equities. It was the more dangerous because it aimed at control of a railroad system in defiance of the Nation's policy to regulate railroad consolidations in the public interest.

The ultimate begetters of important legislation are events. The unregulated practices of distributing securities led to such permeating mischief that Federal legislation became inevitable. To be sure, most States had blue-sky laws. But, on the whole and for a variety of reasons, these laws had failed of their purpose. And so when President Roosevelt asked the Congress for the enactment of the Securities Act as part of his emergency program, he was merely registering a need that could no longer be denied. In his message of March 29, 1933, the President gave authoritative expression to views which the Nation had learned through the bitterest of experience and which, at least in the abstract, no one dared challenge.

"There is * * * an obligation upon us [the President told Congress] to insist that every issue of new securities to be sold in interstate commerce shall be accompanied by full publicity and information, and that no essentially important element attending the issue shall be concealed from the buying public * * *.

"This is but one step in our broad purpose of protecting investors and depositors. It should be followed by legislation relating to the better supervision of the purchase and sale of all property dealt in on exchanges, and by legislation to correct unethical and unsafe practices on the part of officers and directors of banks and other corporations."

In demanding adequate disclosure in the marketing of securities and responsibility for what is said and left unsaid in such disclosures, the President proposed merely a modest first installment of legislative controls to assure commerce and industry a continuous flow of their necessary capital.

Fair play at the start is most essential. The prospectus is the basic appeal to the investor's pocketbook. The rationale of the Securities Act is insistence on candor and completeness in making this appeal. It may be ingenious to deem truth an automatic protection against greed and credulity in investors. Much more could be done and probably will have to be done in governmental oversight of the mechanism of capital investment. But to compel the light now demanded by the Securities Act in places often consciously darkened is merely to require the elementary basis for knowledge before asking people to invest savings upon which so extensively depends the quality of men's lives.

In these matters it is important not to imply more than is said. The inadequacy of the prospectus or selling statement does not fully explain the investing misadventures of the past, nor will its adequacy preclude unsocial manipulation of our corporation laws. Corporate standards are in the main determined by the laws of the State of incorporation. No disinterested student of our corporation laws will gainsay that competition among the States in the so-called "liberality" of their corporation laws has not made for high corporate standards. Powers of corporations are too frequently powers for wiles and stratagems, and their duties too often permit opportunities for concealment and deception. In England the problem of company control is much simpler than with us, as is the case with most of her legal problems. I am not one of those who find in Federal incorporation an easy and seductive remedy. In attempting to solve certain problems, such a measure would, I believe, raise a brood of complicated new ones. I should regard it a matter of regret if the failure of the States to meet their responsibilities to each other, and to work out interstate relationships through devices other than national legislation, should make Federal incorporation a necessity. The Securities Act may well exercise indirect but important influence upon the corporation laws of the States no less than upon corporate managers even where the standards of the Securities Act as to adequate disclosures are not legally binding. One ventures the hope that the persuasive pressure of these new standards will lead to their voluntary adoption in areas not now covered by the act.

In any event, the Securities Act proceeds on the assumption that until less drastic remedies fail the Federal Government should not embark on Federal incorporation nor exercise direct control over capital investments nor follow the too-often futile model of State blue-sky laws for licensing security issues. Acting upon the President's suggestion, the Securities Act carefully withholds authority from the Federal Trade Commission "to take any action which might be construed as approving or guaranteeing that newly issued securities are sound in a sense that their value will be maintained or that the properties which they represent will earn profit." Fundamentally the act seeks to build on self-discipline by all the agencies engaged in marketing securities. By compelling full publicity of "every essentially important element attending the issue of new securities" so that the public may have an opportunity to understand what it buys, the act seeks to promote standards of competence and candor in dealing with the public. It deliberately aims against dormant high-pressure techniques which have in the past so tragically submerged the investment banker's traditional responsibility for disinterested financial advice.

Purporting to speak for important investment interests, witnesses before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce (which reported the Rayburn-Fletcher bill) frankly admitted past abuses and welcomed the principles of the security legislation "as the dawn of a new era, now the full, free, and honest information is to be required before anyone can sell securities to the public * * * and investment bankers can again raise their heads and hold them high." Agreeing with a thing in principle and practicing the opposite is one of man's most common talents. But the terrible social implications of what was hitherto conceived as private enterprise justify one in believing that the Securities Act will not be treated as a temporary concession to fear and disillusionment but the enactment of a principle, loyal adherence to which is demanded especially by those who care most for the maintenance of our present economic system.

III

The Securities Act is strong insofar as publicity is potent; it is weak insofar as publicity is not enough. Publicity is especially effective when a broad sales effort is under way. The existence of bonuses, of excessive commissions and salaries, of preferential lists, and the like, may all be open secrets among the knowing, but the knowing are few. There is a shrinking quality to such transactions; to force knowledge of them into the open is largely to restrain their happening. Many practices safely pursued in private lose their justification in public. Thus social standards newly defined gradually establish themselves as new business habits.

The Securities Act aims primarily at future offerings sold through the mails or through channels of interstate or foreign commerce. It does not affect the ordinary redistribution of securities unless such redistribution is, in effect, a new offering in view of the relations between the issuer and those immediately making the offering. It carefully exempts from its application enumerated types of securities and transactions. Transactions between private persons, not with a view to public offering, are exempt. Governmental securities, the issues of banks, railroads, and cooperatives, are in general not included. Justification of some of these exemptions may well be disputed. But for one reason or another they were deemed not within the needs that have called forth the legislation.

No offering of securities subject to the act can be made until 20 days after the filing with the Federal Trade Commission of a registration statement setting forth prescribed information. Sad experience dictated this device, the reasons for which are thus vindicated in the report of the House committee:

"The compulsory 30-day inspection period (changed to 20 days in conference) before securities can be sold is deliberately intended to interfere with the reckless traditions of the last few years of the securities business. It contemplates a change from methods of distribution lately in vogue which attempted to complete sale of an issue sometimes within 1 day or at most a few days. Such methods practically compelled minor distributors, dealers, and even salesmen, as the price of participation in future issues of the underwriting house involved, to make commitments blindly. This has resulted in the demoralization of ethical standards as between these ultimate sales outlets and the securities-buying public to whom they had to look to take such commitments off their hands. This high-pressure technique has assumed an undue importance in the eyes of the present generation of securities distributors, with its reliance upon delicate calculation of day-to-day fluctuations in market opportunities and its implicit temptation to market manipulation, and must be discarded because the resulting injury to an underinformed public demonstrably hurts the Nation. It is furthermore the considered judgment of this committee that any issue which cannot stand the test of a waiting inspection over a month's average of economic conditions, but must be floated within a few days upon the crest of a possibly manipulated market fluctuation, is not a security which deserves protection at the cost of the public as compared with other issues which can meet this test. There is no more appropriate function of government than that it should encourage reasonable saving by protecting the fruits of that saving."

Doubtless the cooling period will disturb practices that made great headway during the post-war period. That was its purpose. High-pressure salesmanship is inimical to sound finance. The social function of investment banking is betrayed by speed and secretiveness. Thus powerful and astute financial interests have brought unhealthy pressure upon State commissions for the approval of utility issues without adequate time for deliberation. The cooling period will afford the necessary opportunity for scrutiny by State agencies, financial commentators, and investment services. By helping to restore sobriety to American finance, the cooling period may well mark a new era of stable and prudent as opposed to speculative and erratic investment in the United States. It would not be the first time in the history of legislation that the requirement for a more deliberative procedure has been productive of far-reaching improvement in business morality.

The information which must be furnished in the registration statement is intended to reveal facts essential to a fair judgment upon the security offered. To those not versed in the history of corporate finance and therefore not alive to the dangers concealed beneath the decorous surface of financial statements, some of the disclosures required by the act may seem needlessly searching. But a corporate security is a very intricate commodity. What is asked of those who are engaged in its merchandising is well justified by British practice and is addressed especially to the future avoidance of abuses into the current of which some even of our most staid financial houses have been swept.

When the public is asked to finance a business, the essential immunities of private enterprise are abandoned. The public is then entitled to a fair picture of the enterprise; a statement of the character and scope of the business; a revealing description of the corporate structure and of the particular security offered; a statement of the specific purposes for which the new money is to be used, together with disclosure of the more important underlying commitments of the enterprise, including management and service contracts, profit-sharing arrangements, patent agreements, and the like devices by which such money has too often in the past been deftly diverted from its productive purposes; an independently certified balance sheet and a statement of the earnings and operations for at least 3 years, year by year, in such form and detail as in the judgment of the Trade Commission will convey clarity and not confusion.

In the last analysis business, like government, depends on men. The investor, therefore, is entitled to know with whom he is dealing—promoters, directors, principal officers, dominant stockholders, underwriters, and counsel passing on the issue—and to know their interests in the issuing company. He is entitled to know the options outstanding against any securities of the issuer; the remuneration paid to officers in excess of $25,000 a year; the commissions of the underwriters; the compensation of the promoters; the particulars of any properties acquired out of the proceeds, and the stake of officers, directors, or dominant stockholders in any such property. Equally requisite knowledge for an investor is the cost of the security to the issuer and its price to him and to other investors and their relation to price and costs of earlier offerings.

All this information must be furnished by the registration statement. Thus will be exposed distribution profits, watered values, hidden interests, and preferred lists that too frequently have been regarded as the secret perquisites of insiders. No business conducted with common honesty and intelligence need fear the duty of such disclosure. Insofar as the act will be a brake on schemes fraudulently or carelessly conceived, it will serve only to strengthen the constancy and volume of the flow of investment funds into productive channels. Conservatively safeguarded, savings will seek investment.

The heart of regulation is effective administration. That demands adequate powers and ample appropriations intrusted to administrators of courage, imagination, resourcefulness, understanding, and public zeal. The act gives the necessary authority to the Commission. It is empowered to devise the forms in which registration statement and prospects should be cast, and to prescribe methods that will render accounts intelligible and revealing. Operating income will have to be distinguished from investment income; recurring income will no longer be confused with nonrecurring income; depreciation and depletion will properly be shown; consolidated accounts will be elucidated. Skillful accounting rules alertly enforced should preclude the sale of securities through a pretence of profits arising, as in the Forshay adventures, not from real gains but through the manipulations of surplus accounts. The evolution of model financial accounting methods, with which the Commission is now charged, is well calculated to have far-reaching beneficial effects on American corporate practices.

Standards must be enforced and not merely formulated, however admirably. The act endows the Commission with powers for translating paper provisions into action. The period between the registration of a proposed issue and its public offering enables the Commission to test the registration statement for accuracy and completeness. If at any time the Commission finds that the law has been flaunted by the filing of a registration statement untrue or misleading as to material information, upon proper notice and hearing, and subject to appropriate court review, the Commission may stop the further distribution of such ill-sponsored securities. The stop order affects only sales by dealers, leaving individuals free to dispose of their holdings in the open market. The scope of the issues to be considered by the Commission on any stop order is strictly limited and avoids undue interference with the rightful operations of business enterprise. The ultimate question of the business soundness of an issue—a complicated problem in forecasting—is left for individual judgment. Unlike the theory on which State blue-sky laws are based, the Federal Securities Act does not place the Government's imprimatur upon securities. It is designed merely to secure essential facts for the investor, not to substitute the Government's judgment for his own.

After the 20 days following registration, a new issue may be sold through the mails or the channels of interstate commerce only if the buyer is given information substantially duplicating that of the registration statement. The Commission may authorize such curtailment of the data filed with it as is compatible with the protection of investors. British experience will doubtless make the Commission wary of permitting excessive abbreviation. To the eye, securities are merely pieces of paper. But like all things charged with dynamite, they are not playthings for children. A prospectus is intended to put the buyer or his adviser on notice of the many elements essential to an understanding of the intricate devices of modern finance. Brief and bright prospectuses are dangerous. Law cannot prevent gullibility. But it can counteract the enticement of alluring sales talk by requiring, as the Securities Act does require, the disclosure of what William James called "hard and intractible" facts. The process of distribution is long as well as complicated. All sales by security dealers must therefore be based upon the prospectus for a whole year after the public offering, whether or not the security be deemed part of the dealer's original allotment. After the year, assuming the dealer has disposed of his original allotment, effective safeguards affecting new issues no longer apply.

For willful violations of the act there are, of course, criminal penalties. American legislative history, however, proves the very limited function of the criminal law in the assimilation by business of standards of public responsibility. The real needs are the building up of new business habits and the generation of a new moral climate for business. The most reliable governmental furtherance of these ends depends on wise, energetic, and continuous administrative supervision. But an indispensable spur to observance of the standards of the act is the right of recovery by the victims of disobedience. Such responsibility, when freshly brought to men's minds as is done by the Securities Act, disturbs old though unwarranted feelings of legal immunity. But rigorous liability must be the correlative of responsibility. The act would be merely a pious resolution unless the standards of responsibility for the conduct of the investing business had the sanctions of regorous civil liability.

The scope of the liability is carefully defined. Untruth in a material fact or its omission—the means whereby investors are misled—makes all who are chargeable with the duty of knowing and revealing the truth liable to an investor in ignorance of the truth. Barring only the issuer, who obtained the fruits of the bargain, all those who shared in the process of thus misleading the investor—the officers of the company, underwriters, the experts who helped to give authority to a corporate statement—may escape liability upon proof that they had made reasonable investigation into the facts which they helped to disseminate and had reasonably satisfied themselves of the truth and adequacy of such facts. The ominous history of recent years aroused strong feeling in Congress that those responsible for financial representations ought to be obliged to act at their peril, since they were in a position to verify their statements and the innocent investor was not. This explains the feature of the Senate bill imposing absolute liability without opportunity for exculpation. But the moderate proposal of the House bill was enacted, withholding absolute liability and imposing merely the standard of responsibility to which fiduciaries are held. In this respect the legislation follows closely clauses of the British Companies Act, which go back to the Directors' Liability Act of 1890.

The responsibility is simply that which is expected of a careful man in the conduct of his own affairs. He may make use of the work of accountants and other experts; he may under appropriate circumstances act upon the investigation of others. But he cannot insulate himself from the responsibility his duties impose nor by unjustified delegation of duties save himself from contamination with disagreeable knowledge.

When circumstances permit suit, the investor, on tender of the security, may recover the consideration he paid, or damages if he has parted with the security. Since the remedy is in the nature of a rescission, it avoids the inquiry, practically impossible, as to the extent of the damages due to the misrepresentation and the extent due to other causes. To force the injured party to disentangle these items of damage would impose upon him an unfair burden in litigation. Where a material misrepresentation has been made, it is not for those who have been guilty of bad faith or incompetence or recklessness to put the buyer to proof that his bargain was not bad for still other causes. As suit must be brought within 2 years after the discovery or reasonable opportunity for discovery of a material untruth, the dishonest investor would have through delay little opportunity to gamble on the outcome of the venture.

The rights against those responsible for the registration statement run in favor of all innocent buyers whether or not the purchase is made by use of the mails or through channels of interstate commerce. Unless the opportunity of selling through the mails or through channels of interstate commerce is desired, no security need be registered under the act. If this privilege is obtained and the security be registered, the registration affects its value and market appraisal. In consequence, those responsible for the registration are made liable to all who are inevitably affected by it.

In the provisions thus far canvassed, the act is directed solely toward future issues. But it also seeks to terminate the facilities of the mails and of interstate commerce for dishonest or unfair dealings in the sale of all private or foreign government securities, new or old. If any person makes an untrue statement of a material fact or omits to state a fact without which the facts stated would really be misleading, he is subject to a suit for rescission or damages unless he be able to prove that he did not know, or in the exercise of reasonable caution could not have known, such untruth or omission. In effect, this merely imposes upon the seller the duty of good faith and common honesty. As to omissions, the act writes into Federal legislation the English standard of rectitude so strikingly enforced in the recent case of Lord Kylsant. It shifts the burden of proving what the lawyers call "scienter"—knowledge, that is—upon the seller. This is an application of the horse sense upon which the law not infrequently acts, by recognizing that knowledge as to the circumstances attending a seller's assertions is peculiarly in the seller's and not in the buyer's competence.

Finally, the act hits at a type of mercenary who has played an important role in the abuses of the investment business. Especially since the war, under cloak of disinterested information, tipsters' sheets and other publications, while not purporting to offer securities for sale, gave opinions that were bought and paid for. Under the new act, if any consideration is received from an issuer, underwriter, or dealer, it must be fully disclosed by the person responsible for seemingly disinterested advice. If, at the beginning of each radio talk, "Old Counselor" had explained to his hearers that he was being paid for his promotion talk, he would probably have been taken for a comedian and would have been as harmless, though not as entertaining, as Eddie Cantor. Now that gratuities for puffing publications must be disclosed, certain news items about securities may, in the future, not synchronize with the unloading maneuvers of pool managers.

These, in brief, are the chief features of the Securities Act; the needs out of which they arose and the ends which they are intended to serve. Plainly, the act seeks control of only a small area of the revealed serious misdealings with other people's money. It is only the beginning of exertion of Federal power within its field. Like all such legislative beginnings, the act must be deemed definitive merely in principle and not in detail. Despite the praise which its careful draftsmanship has evoked from all sides in Congress and from such informed persons as the financial editor of the New York Herald Tribune, administration and litigation will doubtless disclose defects and lacks calling for correction. Such is the inevitable history of the evolution of important legislation. Sympathetic compliance with the act is the surest way for securing its necessary improvement. Captious and sophisticated resistance is the surest way—if American legislative history be a safe guide—of provoking in due course more Draconian control of investments.

IV

Time must be allowed to disclose the ultimate effects and influence of a statute like the Securities Act, which has such extensive radiation into business enterprise. That such legislation should produce quizzical feelings in some of those whose activities it affects is but natural. The familiar is comfortable, and restriction of past freedom arouses the fear of the unknown which the novel always holds. Some happy days are doubtless over. Of course, the act will be resented by those who are unreconciled to the act's underlying assumptions. If the past was satisfactory, then the act is a needless curb. According to John Stuart Mill, "Improvement consists in bringing our opinions into clearer agreement with facts; and we shall not be likely to do this while we look at facts only through glasses colored by those very opinions." The Securities Act is a conscientious effort to derive governmental policy from experience.

The act sows seeds in many fields of corporate enterprise. Whether these seeds will strike root and give a healthier direction to corporate development will depend on a multiplicity of factors. A lively or torpid public sentiment, a skilled or mediocre administration, a sympathetic or sterile attitude on the part of courts—these are some of the alternatives upon which will depend the outcome of the legislation. But if the act ultimately succeeds, it will not be through any mere compliance with its lettered provisions. Its effects must go deeper. It must reach men's attitudes as to the ends and methods of economic enterprise. The act will never protect the gullible unless it alters the premises of the sophisticated.

Perhaps the starkest aspect of the "new era" which collapsed with the October 1929 crash is that it engulfed in its debauches not only Tom, Dick, and Harry but the kings and princes of finance, their barons and baronets. This was hardly fortuitous. Despite all pretense of close inquiry into specific enterprises and business trends, the desire for quick and large gains has been too dominant an impulse of investment banking. Too often a venture seemed sound if bankers' profit-taking survived the period of the distributive process. Take utility investments. Whatever may have been the legal metaphysics of utility valuation, the conception of "prudent investment" was certainly for the long run in the interest of investors. Yet virtually without exception the bankers opposed the idea when for temporarily rising prices the "reproductive-cost" theory afforded speculative gains, although it was inevitable that a reversal of the trend at some stage would cause grevious loss to their clients.

In a brilliant chapter in his "Other People's Money", Mr. Brandeis demonstrated the small share of the investment banker in establishing our pioneer industries. Theirs is not the glory for the early development of our railways, of the telegraph, telephone, and wireless, gas and oil, of the steel, textile, and shoe industries. They came in only after the feast was spread. The greatest benefit to flow from the Securities Act may well be a truer realization of the banker's function in an industrial society. He has no justification except as the conservative reservoir of savings.

The pressure of the Securities Act will force bankers to a deeper familiarity with the implications of security transactions. Our own tragic experience with security speculation based on reckless ignorance only confirms the insight of Gladstone nearly a hundred years ago that effective publicity generates responsibility. In 1844 the Gladstone committee reported to Parliament that:

"* * * probably the greatest benefit in this direction ['the susceptibility of ignorant persons to be deluded by fraudulent schemes'] will be produced by enabling the share brokers and other persons professionally employed in making investments of this kind to learn more easily and more accurately the real nature of these companies; so that, at least, the ignorant may not be so much misled by the example of persons of weight and intelligence, who have sometimes, with extraordinary recklessness connected themselves with companies which, whether the objects of the promoters, the nature of the enterprise, or the constitution of the company be considered, must be regarded as of a questionable character."

Gladstone could not have been more accurate had he foreseen Kreuger & Toll (the Insull flotations), Alleghany, and Pennroad corporations.

But in the shadow of the Securities Act is said to lurk the terrible specter of the blackmailer, lying in wait for the unprotected and upright man of finance. There may well be a few such creatures; there always have been. But a more characteristic feature of our society is the supineness with which the average American fails to vindicate his claims under the common law for redress of the irresponsibilities of high finance. It is a maxim of jurists that jealousy in enforcing legal rights is an important index to the reign of law. Our apathy in this regard may well be one of the causes of the low standards prevalent in corporate administration. But, in any event, to raise fear of the permeating power of the blackmailer against an otherwise sound law is to make an inadmissible indictment of our legal administration.

The civil remedies of the Securities Act are correlated to the standards of responsibility and competence to be exacted. Business honestly conceived and competently administered has nothing to fear and much to gain. Remedies are afforded only for wrongdoing. "He who is unwilling to assume the responsibility of a fiduciary has no business to be a fiduciary." Integrity, courage, and ability are not so lacking in this country that new and perhaps better leaders will not be found to take the place of those who shrink from responsibilities incident to the business of managing other people's money.

The assumption is too widely prevalent that the complexities of large affairs should relieve those engaged in them from the liabilities which govern the smaller dealings of man. Because the ramifications of great enterprise are so far-reaching, lawyers too often endeavor to protect their clients from all responsibility. Astute trust documents turn trusteeship into a lucrative privilege without duty. In his analysis of the St. Paul receivership, Mr. Max Lowenthal, in the Investor Pays, has shown that bankers devised the reorganization agreement which gave them control of vast properties and substantially relieved themselves of responsibility to their real owners. The Securities Act embodies a wholly different conception of business morals. It aims to make it difficult for corporate managers to evade responsibility. Corporate officials and bankers will, it is hoped, hereafter not be "protected" through lawyers' skill in manipulating language. Real protection will reside, as it should, in competence and character.

Undue reference to the blackmailer implies an obsolete conception of large business affairs. The blackmailer's habitat is darkness. Public financing should live in the light of day. Corporate affairs are still too widely deemed private affairs, and the desire for knowledge about them, intrusions into private business. Corporate managers too often forget that they are put on preferred lists not because of their own virtues but because of their control over other people's money. In short, the managers of large affairs hold not private but essentially public offices. Their acts should be held up to the same scrutiny as those of public officials. The investments of a bank president have no greater claim to privacy than those of ex-Mayor Walker. I am speaking of the essence of things, not according to antiquated lawyers' quibbles. And as to the realities of corporate and financial enterprise, law cannot much longer lag behind realities.

The Securities Act thus proceeds on the principle that when a corporation seeks funds from the public it becomes in every true sense a public corporation. Its affairs cease to be the private perquisite of its bankers and managers; its bankers and managers themselves become public functionaries. This principle has been slow of acceptance, particularly with those profitably accustomed to the old and easy ways. But surely one confident prophecy may be ventured about the Securities Act. The principle of public trusteeship of public moneys in corporate affairs which it applies is bound to receive more and not less recognition.

CONSTRUCTION OF NEW YORK POST-OFFICE ANNEX

As in legislative session,

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I desire at this time to bring out some facts in connection with the awarding of the contract for the construction of the New York City post-office annex. From the documents and figures I have on my desk it appears that some people are conniving at the illegal award of a building contract. I shall review briefly the facts surrounding this matter, and if any Member of the Senate knows any of the statements I shall make to be incorrect or not well founded, I will be glad to be corrected.

Last February, under the Hoover administration, bids were invited for the construction of the New York post-office annex. I think that was done on the 28th of February. Shortly thereafter the new administration came into power, and, because of the imminence of the N.R.A., all bids were rejected. The project was readvertised, new bids were invited on very definite specifications. Accompanying the invitation for bids was Bulletin No. 51, entitled "Information Relating to the Negotiation and Administration of Contracts for Federal Projects Under Title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act."

Several concerns submitted bids. Two concerns, Driscoll & Co., of New York, and Stewart & Co., of New York, were the lowest bidders. The question then arose as to which of the two should be awarded the contract. Therefore it became pertinent to examine the conditions under which the bids were received.

The pamphlet which accompanied the invitation to bid, and which covered the specifications as to how the bids were to be received, contained this language:

SEC. 53. N.R.A. requirements: Instructions to bidders and contractors—

Mark these words—

No bids will be accepted from any contractor who has not signed and complied with the applicable approved code of fair competition adopted under title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act.

No bids will be accepted from any contractor who has not signed and complied with the code of fair competition.

On inspecting the bids it was found that Driscoll & Co. had not signed the code and had not complied with the terms under which the bids were invited.

When Mr. Driscoll found that he was the lowest bidder but was not qualified because he had not complied with the terms of the invitation for bids, 3 days after the time for opening the bids he complied with the requirements by posting a letter in the mail in Brooklyn, and that letter came here about a week after the bids were opened.

Immediately various influences injected themselves into the equation to get Mr. Driscoll the contract, among them some of the officials of the N.R.A., who may have acted without a proper knowledge of the fact. An appeal was made to the Attorney General of the United States for an opinion, and I have that opinion in my hand, which sustains the view that Mr. Driscoll's bid should have been thrown out because he had not complied with the specifications sent out to bidders which required that they sign the codes prior to the opening of the bids. I want to read the Attorney General's opinion, which is not long and which is as follows:

SIR: I have the honor to respond to your request of October 24, 1933, for an opinion arising out of the following facts:

The Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department has heretofore published an invitation, dated September 18, 1933, announcing that bids would be received and opened on October 2, 1933, for certain construction work in connection with the post-office annex at New York. Attached to the specification, as a part thereof, was Bulletin No. 51—

I have just read from that bulletin—of the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works, entitled "Information Relating to the Negotiation and Administration of Contracts for Federal Projects Under Title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act." The bulletin contained the following provisions, among others:

"SEC. 9. The attention of contracting officers is directed to the policy of the Administration referred to in section 53 of this bulletin.

"SEC. 53. N.R.A. requirements: (a) No bids will be accepted from any contractor who has not signed and complied with the applicable approved code of fair competition adopted under title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act for the trade or industry or subdivision thereof concerned, or, if there be no such approved code of fair competition, who has not signed and complied with the provisions of the President's reemployment agreement."

At the time of the opening of the bids on October 2, no code of fair competition applicable to the construction industry was in effect. The lowest bidder had not up to that time adhered to the P.R.A., but did so later by submitting a signed agreement to the National Recovery Administration on October 4 and the required certificate of compliance some time between October 6 and October 9.

Recall that the bids were opened October 2.

You request my opinion as to whether under such circumstances the lowest bidder has complied with the requirements of section 53 of Bulletin 51.

That section, in effect, provides that no bids will be accepted from any contractor who has not signed and complied with either the applicable approved code of fair competition or with the P.R.A. The language is clear and free from ambiguity. Its manifest meaning is that the contractor must have adhered to the applicable code or the P.R.A., as the case may be, prior to or at least not later than at the time of the opening of the bids, in order to be eligible for consideration. An adherence at a subsequent date will not bring the bidder within the requirements of section 53.

Any other conclusion would be not only violative of the letter but also subversive of the spirit of the provision. It would permit a contractor—

Mark these words!—

It would permit a contractor to withhold his decision to adhere to the P.R.A. until he ascertained whether or not he was the successful bidder. It would thus operate to the disadvantage of concerns that are cooperating in good faith in the national recovery program.

It was said by one of my predecessors (13 Ops. Atty. Gen. 510, 511):

"The authority to invite proposals implied an authority to prescribe responsible terms and conditions. To announce under this authority that no bid will be considered which does not comply with certain directions, and afterward to consider and accept a bid not complying with such directions, is unjust to the complying bidders."

The power and authority of the Administration of Public Works to include such a provision in the specification is not to be doubted. As I indicated in my opinion to the President, dated July 29, 1933, the head of an executive department or independent establishment empowered to make contracts is clothed with implied authority to include in them such terms as may be deemed desirable in the interest of the Government or of the public welfare (see also 28 Ops. Atty. Gen. 121, 125).

The program of public works undertaken under the provisions of title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act is a part of a comprehensive Nation-wide plan for economic recovery. In order to attain the desired objective, it is essential that public-works contractors participate in the other phase of the plan; that contemplated by title I of the act. With that end in view section 53 has been included by the Administration of Public Works in its specifications and invitations for bids.

I, therefore, have the honor to advise you that, in the case submitted by you, the lowest bidder has not complied with the requirements of section 53 of Bulletin 51, and the contract should not be awarded to him.

Respectfully,

_____ _____,

Attorney General.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

That was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury. That removed the firm of Driscoll & Co. from the field. The contract then should have been let to Stewart & Co., who were the lowest qualified bidder having signed and complied with the N.R.A. code prior to the time of the opening of the bids, which Driscoll did not do until a week later, when he found he was the lowest bidder and thus had an unfair advantage of making a second choice as to whether or not he wanted the contract or did not want it at all. Of course, Driscoll & Co. then wanted the contract. They knew the Attorney General had ruled against them; so they appealed to the Comptroller that the contract should be given to the lowest bidder, notwithstanding the provisions of the invitation to bid. I do not believe the Comptroller had all the facts, but his opinion, which I have not here, simply indicates that the lowest bidder, whether qualified or not, should have the contract.

I am going to read again, in consonance with the Attorney General's opinion, the exact language of the invitation to bid:

No bids will be accepted—

Mark that, "No bids will be accepted"—

No bids will be accepted from any contractor who has not signed and complied with the applicable approved code of fair competition adopted under title I of the National Industrial Recovery Act for the trade or industry or subdivision thereof concerned, or, if there be no such approved code of fair competition, who has not signed and complied with the provisions of the President's reemployment agreement.

Mr. Driscoll admits he has not done it. He makes no bones of the fact that he did not mail his letter until 4 days after he was determined to be the lowest bidder.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. When was the contract let?

Mr. TYDINGS. It has not been let and that is the reason why I am here today; because I am afraid it is going to be illegally let and if it is we will air some things I have not time to go into this morning.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Comptroller General hold that he should have accepted this bid?

Mr. TYDINGS. He did.

Mr. NORRIS. At the time Driscoll signed the N.R.A. agreement had any contract been let?

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. That was several days after the bids were opened?

Mr. TYDINGS. That was a week after the bids were opened; after they were received by the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Would there have been any harm in permitting the successful bidder to sign this agreement; and would it not have been a substantial compliance with the requirement, especially if the bidder did not know about it?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator's question is very pertinent. Let me read what was sent to the so-called successful or lowest bidder, and was sent to every bidder, and was in his hands at the time he filed his bid:

That no bid will be accepted—

To accept means to receive, to hold, to take—from any contractor who has not signed and complied with the applicable code.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is perfectly clear that technically he had not complied with those specifications.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. At the same time, would it have injured anybody if he had been permitted to sign later?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, sir; it certainly would.

Mr. NORRIS. How would that injury have occurred?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me suppose that the Senator wants me to build him a house out in Nebraska, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and I are three contractors, and the Senator from Nebraska requires certain provisions to be complied with in filing our bids. He may say that I shall not use anything but white labor, or shall use wire nails, or slate shingles, or what not; and I comply with those requirements in making my bid. The other two Senators, for some reason or other, do not comply. Then, notwithstanding that I am the low bidder on the very thing the Senator asked me to bid on, he says, "Well, your work does not count for anything. I am going to give the contract to the other two fellows." Then I say, "Well, if you had left me in the same position as the others, I could have made a lower bid. I had to anticipate the future, the price of the materials you requested. I did not have any option as to whether or not I should use them. I posted a bond to go through with this work. I had no option as to whether or not I might take the contract. You could sue me for nonperformance or hold my bond. I had to comply with your requirements beforehand; but you allowed these other people to come here and make their bids without any of those obligations or responsibilities. Naturally, therefore, my bid may have been a little bit higher." But may I ask the Senator in return, knowing his great sense of fairness, what is the use of compelling bidders to comply with certain restrictions in a bid if they are not to amount to anything?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I shall be glad to answer that as well as I can.

I agree, to begin with, that if the contract had been let before the successful bidder had filed his agreement to adhere to the N.R.A. provisions, he would have been out, even though he was the lowest bidder; but, after all, one of the big objects is to let this contract in such a way that it will save money to the people who have to pay for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am coming to that. I am prepared to show, a little later on, that we will save money by giving it to Stewart.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be. I am not going into that question. I do not know as to that.

I say to these other bidders on my house, "You have not complied with my stipulation, and I cannot give you this contract"; and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] says, "What is your stipulation?" I tell him, and he then files with me a statement that he agrees to it. Now, if somebody has been injured by that, another question will arise; but since no contract has been let I cannot see where anybody is injured if the other bidders are allowed to file their agreement to that effect even 2 or 3 days or any time before the contract is let.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not know how familiar the Senator is with the decisions of the Comptroller, but the Comptroller has held over and over again that all people must bid on the same plane. Notwithstanding a man is the lowest bidder, and may 2 days later comply with certain provisions of the invitation to bid—for example, suppose he did not file a bid bond with his bid, but is willing, the day after, to come through with the bid bond—his bid cannot be accepted. This is a democracy; and one man cannot be compelled to bid on one plane, and another man released from the provisions of that bidding, whether anybody is hurt or not.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not profess to know, of course; I might change my mind if I should look up all the authorities; but, right at first blush, it seems to me that in the case the Senator puts nobody has been injured. Nobody has sacrificed anything. The bids have been opened. A technical compliance was not had as to one or more of the bidders. It would be proper to throw out the bids; but if that is done before any action is taken, who would be hurt, and why would the taxpayers be saved money by the course the Senator suggests?

Mr. TYDINGS. Personal references are always undesirable; but because I am on the Senator's side of the controversy I am about to mention, I want to show him the unfairness that exists where nobody, perhaps, is hurt.

I remember a time when the Senator from Nebraska was running for the United States Senate. I remember a time when his opponents went out and got a groceryman who happened to have exactly the same name as the Senator and put him on the ticket, so that people would not know which of the two Norrises they were voting for. Technically that did not hurt the Senator. People ought to have known; but the Senator was rightfully indignant, and I was with him, because it was a snide trick.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that technically it did not hurt me. It was the end of the whole thing.

Mr. TYDINGS. But the point I am making is that these people have complied with all the requirements. They have hired clerks to read what was necessary to find every loophole; so that their bids would be 100 percent in accordance with the terms, conditions, and restrictions laid down. They went over and over and over the matter, not only to get the low dollar but to see that they had done everything which was required by the Government as a condition precedent to awarding the contract. The other man did not do that. What is the use of saying that no bid will be accepted except under certain restrictions if it does not mean anything?

Mr. NORRIS. It does mean something, I think.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I interrupt the Senator? The statement was not that no contract will be awarded, even though the man is the low bidder, until he complies with the terms of the N.R.A., but that no bid will be accepted.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understood that.

Mr. TYDINGS. If it had said that which the Senator implies, I should not be here. I should think the man had a perfect right to do what was done; but let us go on.

What was done? There are certain ramifications which I do not care to relate this morning, because I only want to hit the essentials. Therefore, notwithstanding by the Attorney General's opinion Stewart was the lowest qualified bidder, all the bids were thrown out for the second time. Driscoll had to be the low bidder. So they advertised the contract the third time, and what happened that time?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator state what was the difference in the bids between the lowest bidder and the next lowest bidder?

Mr. TYDINGS. At that time? I do not recall the amount, but it was not large. It was a $4,000,000 contract. It may have been $4,000, or it may have been $20,000. It was not a large sum of money.

The next time the authorities put out the bids, they asked for alternative bids: One to build the post office with the fourth and fifth floors unfinished, and the other to build the post office with the whole thing finished.

Under the first bid, which was to complete the building, Driscoll & Co., which was the individual firm that did not comply with the N.R.A. code the first time, bid $3,260 lower than Stewart on the whole building. Stewart was $46,790 lower than Driscoll, with the fourth and fifth floors out; and I am advised now that the lower bid—that is, the Stewart bid—in the end will cost the Government less than the Driscoll bid will at this time. More than that, the Post Office Department, so I am advised by authentic authorities, said they were not ready for the fourth and fifth floors, and to partition them and equip them now, before they could visualize how the other floors would be fitted up, would not be feasible; but after that representation was made to the Treasury Department through some channel—I do not know how it happened—I understand it was withdrawn, and a new proposition came that the Post Office Department in effect wanted the building, and to build it anyhow.

I take the position, first, that Stewart & Co. by every rule of right and reason should have gotten that contract last October. I take the position again that if certain bidders were not qualified then and the matter was opened for bids again for any purpose, only those who were qualified to bid at that time should have been permitted to bid on the second opening of the bids. To allow others, after they had been beaten on one bid, unfairly to come in and bid the second time and get this contract is outrageous.

I do not want to make any threats, and I do not mean to have my statement construed in that way; but because one of my constituents is interested in this matter, because I have been familiar with it much more than many people know from start to finish, I do not propose to sit idly by and see this outrage perpetrated. I think there has been some weakness down in the Treasury Department. I think somebody down there has lacked a little intestinal fortitude to do what should have been done. There have been too many letters passing back and forth for the evident purpose of making this bid go eventually to Driscoll & Co.

I have been here 11 years, and outside of the time Mr. Albert Williams, a lieutenant in the Navy, supposed to be our best flyer, was quickly dumped out of the service and I thought had been unfairly treated, I have never asked for an investigation of anything. Perhaps I should have, but I have not. I desire to serve notice now on the proper authorities, however, that I propose to have an investigation of this thing, and go to the bottom of it and bring out every letter unless the contract is awarded in accordance with the facts.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that while I do not agree with him on the proposition that he has laid down, I do agree with him that if he wants an investigation, I shall be for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I appreciate that.

Mr. NORRIS. That will not hurt any honest man.

Mr. TYDINGS. No.

Mr. NORRIS. It will not hurt any honest government. Whatever the facts are, they ought to be brought out.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I may be a little ahead of myself. The Treasury Department has not awarded this contract yet.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what I wanted to ask the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am reluctant to make what might be called charges against them in the absence of action; but certainly up to now there is nothing in the record to commend itself to anybody. It is only because I have seen the thing wiggled and wiggled from month to month that I felt I had better say a word before the horse got out of the stable. I want everybody to know that I propose to see that Stewart & Co. get a run for their money in this thing. They have been outrageously treated by people who have not had the courage to award this contract where it ought to have gone; and there is a whole lot more that time does not permit me to bring out today that will go into the record unless justice is done.

EVILS OF DICTATORSHIP

As in legislative session,

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a speech made by Emil Holmes, national commander of the United States War Veterans and Civilians, Inc., together with the preamble of its platform. I hope this organization of United States War Veterans and Civilians may prosper in its work of patriotic appeal. There has never been a time in the history of our country where brave hearts were needed more than today, that the fundamentals of our Government may be maintained. I understand the heart and soul of this organization of the United States War Veterans and Civilians, according to its preamble, made part of the record, it is organized to unselfishly promote an understanding of what our country and its institutions mean and to fight for their maintenance.

There are too few organizations which have their country's welfare in mind. History is replete with the record of nations which in times of economic chaos, like that through which we are passing today, have lost their independent privileges and the liberties in gaining which they and their forefathers had given their property and their lives. There has always been, and there always will be, some unscrupulous Caesar who will, if excuse affords, usurp the functions of a Republic like ours and build a dictatorship upon the ruined and shattered elements of our once glorious Nation.

Where liberty reigns, there tyranny and sordid treason too often seek to undermine the sovereignty of the people. He who will not make such bold protest as he can against such usurpation is unworthy of the name American. Today foes within and foes without threaten.

Foreign jealousies, the corruption of our trusted servants, vice, social discord today are all joined in misleading our people, and leaders, under the guise of economic recovery, are leading us into the greatest racketeering debauch with which history in any country has no parallel—much less in a Republic built upon the teachings of Christ, where equality of opportunity is assured, where the cornerstone of our structure is the advancement of the individual through merit.

The safety of our Nation today lies not alone in economic recovery, not even in the perfection of our laws, for, as we have seen in recent months, our very Constitution may be disregarded. A disregarded constitution is poison that will, if not immediately corrected, eat away the very foundation upon which our individual liberty rests. This disregard of our Constitution today stands like an evil spirit behind the Stars and Stripes, ready to swoop down at the moment when fear and intimidation has been tuned to the proper pitch, through subsidizing, with the Government's money, taxpayer's money, of all avenues through which the people may gain information, and carry away in its talons not only our individual liberty but the very emblem of hope that represents to ourselves and to the world the right to develop a soul.

Our Nation's defense lies not alone in our Army and Navy, but in the understanding and soul of our people, our devotion to our free institutions, unbridled avenues of information to the people, and our public schools, from whose towers the Stars and Stripes should show the spirit in which our coming generations should be reared.

When I realize that such an organization as the United States Veterans and Civilians has been organized, as were the minute men of the Revolution, to constitute themselves a foreguard to the treasures of our liberty's temple, my heart rejoices, for I know the morrow's sun, with its light of information, will bring millions and millions of defenders ready to pour out, if need be, the last drop of devoted blood that the name of freedom's home may be perpetuated.

Our economic recovery can be immediately accomplished, without destruction of a single privilege or liberty, by a tariff barrier that will put to work immediately our 12,000,000 idle men in furnishing the goods and producing the food of which our 48 States and Territories are in need.

Ninety-four percent of our commerce is within our own States. Ninety-four percent recovery will be sufficient to tide us over this destruction period. Our country today is flooded with goods made and raised in foreign countries by labor paid as low as 10 cents a day in our 60-cent dollar. To raise the prices of these foreign goods without a protective barrier only means more flooding and consequently more idle in our country, that they may be the more susceptible to the propaganda of a dictatorship, to the substitution of an imitation Russian eagle, with its consequent bureaucracy deadened by its own weight and darkened by its own ignorance, for the Stars and Stripes.

Whatever strength I may have is gladly tendered to the preservation of our free institutions. May God guide and help this organization to that end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES VETERANS AND CIVILIANS, INC.

PLATFORM AND POLICY

*Article I. * * * Preamble*

The United States Veterans, an all-American organization, imbued with a deep spirit of patriotism, believing in and adhering to the Constitution of the United States of America, formed for and determinately dedicated to the purpose of promoting the general welfare of the common people of this Nation, in convention assembled, in the common cause of the veterans and civilian citizens, constituting a majority of the people of the United States of America, declare that:

We will revive the spirit and ideals of the founders of the Republic, to the end that "life, liberty, and the pursuit of human happiness" will again become an American doctrine, in fact as well as in theory. With equal opportunities to all—special privileges to none.

We affirm that this Nation was founded for the benefit of the majority and that the sovereign power is vested entirely with the people.

We affirm that the cause for the present economic condition under which our country groans, is directly traceable to the flagrant departure from the principles of the Constitution, by a group comprising a small minority who through selfishness and greed gained control of the wealth and natural resources of the Nation, to the detriment of the majority of its people. That vast, gigantic fortunes have been merged and pyramided, under the absolute control of a few men, utterly destroying all economic opportunity and equality, contrary to the spirit and principle of democracy, making it, from year to year, increasingly more difficult to earn a lawful living and causing untold suffering and misery to the veterans and civilian citizens of the Nation.

The hour is at hand! Delay is dangerous! We must act and act at once if we are going to save the vast majority of our people from gradually drifting into serfdom, and the American standard of living from sinking to the level of a European peasantry.

Believing that the most effective weapon in the hands of the people is the ballot it is the aim and purpose of this organization to weld and consolidate the veteran-citizen political strength into one solid unit; and as a unit to cooperate with patriotic and civil organizations and to endorse candidates for public office who are sympathetic with our aims, who will without reservation subscribe to our program and faithfully labor to accomplish all of its purposes.

OUR TASK

(Emil E. Holmes, national commander United States War Veterans and Civilians, Inc.)

The name of our organization should indicate that every American citizen is eligible for membership. It should also indicate to the men or women who have worn the uniform of their country that they are confronted by an organization that demands of them to take over the political leadership of their local community, their State, and the Nation. This, of course, must be done through the ballot—we shall not tolerate revolutionary activity of any nature. That word is sometimes used in connection with the political overthrow of some particular group, but that is not the usually accepted sense in which it is applied. The United States Veterans and Civilians make the statement that we have within our existing form of government every needed implement for the correcting of such things as are preventing the advancement of progress.

It is our conviction that practically all war veterans of this Nation will agree with the above statement. It is our belief that the citizens of this country have confidence in the patriotism of the war veterans. It is our belief that those veterans have not forgotten their oath and are today as patriotic as ever. And when confronted with problems they will without hesitation decide as always—to stand by the Constitution and that the American flag shall continue to represent the ideals expressed in that Constitution. That is a guarantee of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness on the part of every individual man, woman, and child of this country.

It is our belief that the first and most important task before us is the organization of councils in every county of each State, and that in each local council economic issues should be thoroughly gone into. The formation of such local councils with the war veteran and the civilians sitting down together will create an opportunity for a mutual exchange of ideas that we believe will be decidedly beneficial to both. It is our contention that the things asked by war veterans as a whole are not unreasonable. We have yet to find very many citizens who are not veterans that are not also in favor of a square deal for the veteran. It then seems to follow in logical order that the remaining task is for both to meet and organize. The small, selfish minority will be at once eliminated so far as their influence goes—and a majority of the people of this country are then on parade for success. The men and women who have sacrificed through military service and thereby displayed more than an ordinary patriotic interest in the affairs of our country will as usual carry the flag. The goal of this particular parade is the ballot box.

Now, out of the great economic questions that confront our country, we might select any one of a couple dozens as the leading issue. It seems safe, however, to say, that to get labor back to work with an increased purchasing power, so that agriculture will find a market for its product is the main problem. The so-called "National Recovery Act" does not seem to be designed for exactly that purpose; at any rate, in spite of the high-pressure publicity campaign, agriculture is decidedly unhappy and only the Civil Works Administration efforts have prevented the roar that was so sure to come from labor. What will happen when the taxpayers want an accounting in the way of accomplishments for the vast sums of money expended? This yet remains to be seen.

Al. Smith has had something to say about the "baloney dollar." United States Senator Thomas D. SCHALL, of Minnesota, has roared plenty of objection to the N.R.A. Recent press reports say that Herbert Hoover advises the Republicans to wait until Congress is well along before they open their campaign. President Roosevelt, with the press supporting him in almost every move, has proclaimed from time to time that he will experiment until we make a hit. Personally, I am a Democrat, and was an active supporter of the President in the last campaign when I was a Democratic candidate for Congress. My position at this moment, however, makes me the speaker for a nonpartisan group; all of them loyal to not only the office, but the man, Frank D. Roosevelt, himself, who seems to be trying to operate more from an all-American standpoint than he does that of a partisan.

It may seem the act of a superegotist to even offer suggestions to the President of the United States, but we would like to call attention to two facts: First, that we represent a very large number of average taxpayers; and, second, that the war veterans who actually have war records and who make up a large number of our organization feel themselves entitled to the right of expression. We found during war time that the Congress and the administration, of which Franklin D. Roosevelt was a part, did not hesitate to draft our lives and order us out on the field of battle. If we are good enough to die for this country then we humbly submit that we have a right to political expression in spite of the innumerable newspaper articles sent out by the traitors who write for the National Economy League.

Our first suggestion would be that instead of spending hundreds of millions of dollars to keep the farmer from planting his crops, those amounts be used for the rehabilitation of industry, so that the working people of this country might once more secure a normal purchasing power and thereby absorb the farm surplus. Does it seem common sense to spend the taxpayers' money to pay anyone "not to produce a surplus" when you have millions searching even the garbage cans for a mouthful of food to keep alive? Mr. President, please turn from your brain trust for a moment and give the common folks of the Nation your attention; also please turn for a moment to the platform adopted at the Chicago convention; it will be dangerous to drift very far from that sound Americanism; it will be dangerous to sail into the sea of socialism—apparently intended by the action to place all industry directly under Government operation. We should like to call the attention of the President to the fact that no patchwork plan will pull us out of this, and it is decidedly wrong to curb individualism, even to the point already done, for fear that it may result in a political dictatorship of industry, which will mean that the drones are going to run the working bee and, instead of honey, we will get a mixture that will not be satisfactory; that this is a fact is already proven in the failure of the N.R.A. The sooner the President sends General Johnson and some other generals of the swivel-chair variety home, and the leaders of industry meet in common council with agriculture and the Government acts in a cooperative position, the better it will be for the country. The records on unemployment produced by the American Federation of Labor indicate that the honesty of General Johnson of N.R.A. fame is decidedly questionable. We put forward the proposition that it is a patriotic duty to demand of the President that the people be heard; this theory that we have no right to ask questions and say what we think is un-American and must be a child of this so-called "brain trust." It certainly is no part of the Democratic Party, even in spite of the fact that a large number of the party leaders have lost their voice in recent months, and apparently their self-respect. It is not a part of the Republican program; that is, if the platforms of the party indicate its philosophy.

Economic ills cannot be cured by political pills, unless those pills have a tendency to correct things that obstruct the proper function of natural economic law; it would seem that the tendency to try and correct conditions in this country by high-pressure publicity and a loud-voiced general shouting is not exactly going according to common sense or recognizing fundamental economic principles. Every time that anyone has even dared to raise a question, we have heard that same voice crying, as that heard during the war, "This is unpatriotic, it is not American", etc. We contend, however, that the proposition in itself is not American, and we challenge any organization to show a higher percentage of patriotism. It needs immediate and sharp reorganization; it requires the energy of the Government to correct conditions in this country—but unless this is applied in a cooperative way we will have a dictatorship such as they have in Italy or the socialization scheme of Russia. It is the belief of this organization that we have, through the American plan of industry and agriculture, meeting in common council with every energy of the Government utilized to aid, a plan that is superior and which will preserve the freedom of our people.

Recently a very well-advertised but very ignorant Member of Congress tried to tell the people that the millions being spent for various projects, that all of us common folk know will produce no revenue, are not a load on us common taxpayers; he said that the big taxpayers carried this load. Now, of course, everyone knows that all increased tax at once means increased rents and every other necessity of life. The President of the United States is a highly intelligent man; he knows that the real load will be carried by the people; he knows what took place in Great Britain through the dole; he knows that billions spent in projects that will not produce a revenue within our lifetime and that carry an interest-bearing bond issue is decidedly dangerous. Therefore, why not some action by the common folk to let the President know that we want to cooperate with him, but that we insist on a voice in the matter, and that every form of freedom bought and paid for by the blood of Americans and American money must not be tampered with, and that we want no radical departure into unsafe and untried schemes at the cost of $10,000,000,000 of interest-bearing bonds? Why not let him know that there must be no shifting from the Americanism of the Constitution, and as Democrats from the democracy of Jefferson and Jackson?—and we might well include the Republicanism of Lincoln and that other great Roosevelt.

Our organization had introduced a bill in this last session of the Minnesota Legislature; it was an effort to create a Minnesota department of public relief. This would be divided into three departments—that of the soldier-welfare division, the public-health division, and that of general public relief. The measure would have saved money, in spite of the fact that it called for a direct appropriation of 10 million and additional powers by the State executive council to vote another 25. It would have made it possible to do away with all of the hooey in county-relief systems; it would have given the poor victim of circumstances a physical examination upon application for relief, and I am positive saved many thousands a premature death from tuberculosis. I have always felt that our Governor has some decidedly human qualities, but members of this present legislature will find it difficult to answer directly some questions as we enter their districts in this next campaign. I am prepared to prove that this measure would, if made a law, have saved the taxpayers money and rendered a much greater service than the various systems now in use. It would prevent duplication of effort and give real relief to those actually in need. If that measure was accompanied by the land-recovery measure, so that an unemployed family could be placed on the farm and raise their own foodstuffs while engaged in rehabilitation, it would mean, if done in a real systematic manner, that in 2 years we would have most of the load self-supporting. It would take the drag off the cities and not unload one dime extra relief on any agricultural county—the transfer would be carried by the State and properly supervised.

Many farmers will seriously object—as will great numbers in the industrial centers—when I suggest that a law be designed in every State that will cause the labor-saving machine to carry its share of the burden in the rehabilitation program for the millions of unemployed, who are to a large extent the direct result of labor-saving machinery. Perhaps it is considered egotistical to even offer a suggestion at Washington, but I made such a suggestion to President Roosevelt, and further suggested that the Secretary of Labor be assigned by him to undertake a Nation-wide survey so that we might know the percentage to write into such a law—it should not be an unfair law—it should not be designed with the idea of preventing the further introduction of labor-saving machinery.

The peanut politicians howling for a return to human labor without offering a systematic plan, to have the machine carry the load and merely trying to paint a picture for labor votes and offer labor nothing in return but a chance to go back to the pick and shovel days. That certainly is not progress, or in any sense to be desired, to make the machine carry its share of the load and real systematic supervision of the entire program would be progressive. Our organization is now working on a bill and hopes to have copies available shortly in every State, so that our local councils can force recognition of it in this next campaign and thereby insure passage in a number of States this next year.

It is worse than useless to think that our problem is going to solve itself. This blabber about getting back to the good old times will get us nothing. Folks, we are in the middle of the stream, we have got to swim with all our strength if we are to reach that other shore. It requires the combined pulling power of us all. I am positive after talking to all factions that everyone has a sincere desire to see some real results. It is logical that sane men and women confined in a house that was on fire would seek to obtain orderly exit and immediate application of effort to put out the fire. Through the medium of study and exchange of ideas in the public forum, provided by our organization, we believe is the avenue out of the building, and that from such exchange of ideas and united effort to make them a reality will be the means to extinguish the flames and return our country to a peaceful normal home of happy men and women. All we actually ask is your cooperation; there is no intention to make this movement a money-making racket. I personally ask the cooperation of everyone to drive from our ranks anyone exhibiting any such desire; we are faced with a crisis; it takes the full measure of strength of every one of us and unselfish patriotism to complete the task.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND OF THE PRESS

As in legislative session,

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I suppose everybody is familiar with the fact that dictatorships flourish all over the world today. The origin of a dictatorship is always interesting. History is replete with such matters. Invariably in the past the first step in that direction taken by one who proposed to have himself constituted a dictator was to suppress the parliamentary bodies of the particular country in which he hoped to reign. The right of free speech by the people's representatives was, therefore, violated, and the representatives of the people in the parliamentary body were unable, because of the gag that had been placed upon them, properly to represent their constituents. In other words, the legislative assembly was practically suppressed, sometimes at the point of the sword, but in any event suppressed. That has invariably been the first step.

The next step has always been to muzzle the press and all means of communication among the people. That is the story history tells, and that is a statement of modern conditions throughout the world where dictators flourish, excepting that today the radio has been added to the list of those things to be censored and licensed. The radio is never free today where any dictator is in power. The press is never free in any place where a dictator rules. Parliamentary bodies are not free to express themselves in any country where there is despotism.

Mr. President, because of these facts I think it well to observe some of the signs of the times in this country with reference to developments coming on apace.

I stated a moment ago that the first thing he who desires to rule by himself alone invariably does is to gag the legislative body or bodies in the Nation over which he would rule, and when he does that it amounts to a violation of the constitutional right of freedom of speech through preventing objections to pending measures in that body when objections may be apparent and awaiting opportunity for expression.

By forcing a gag rule on a legislative assembly he who desires to rule alone deprives a minority in that body of the right of freedom of discussion, although they are sent there by the people to represent them and to discuss problems which intimately concern them. It happens that people may be unrepresented in that manner. There may be war veterans involved, and if the representatives who are there in that body are interested in the problems of the war veterans a gag prevents them from expressing themselves on that problem, and without expression they are shunted off to the tender mercies of a bureaucracy, to people who have not been elected to represent them or to administer their affairs. It also is apt to be a betrayal of government employees in the nation where one desires to rule alone because they are deprived of representation and their problems cannot be discussed.

If it happens to be a country in which there is a tradition of checks and balances for a three-fold form of government, it submerges one of the three departments—the legislative, places it under the domination of the Executive, and the checks and balances are gone. Not only that, but it would deprive the people themselves of information they are entitled to have; it would force the surrender of the legislative power to the Executive, to be then in turn delegated to a bureaucrat, and again representative government will have failed.

If such attempted dictation to a legislative body should transpire in a country such as ours, where we have a bicameral system, and it should apply to only one of the two bodies, the other body would then become the guardian of the people's liberty and the right of free speech. In this case it would be the Senate as the last fortress in which free speech and free discussion of public questions might survive. Because of these facts some of us are gravely concerned over the administration's insistence on a gag rule in one of the bodies of the Congress, such as was forced upon the House of Representatives last week. This gag rule over the people's representatives, forced by an Executive who desires to rule by himself alone, together with reckless extravagance and the enormous deficit of billions confronting the Treasury of the United States, will cause the American people to lose confidence in their Government as it is now conducted as nothing else could cause them to lose confidence.

I pass now, Mr. President, to another phase of the question of free speech. I mention these matters today because I think it is high time they were brought to the attention of the country.

The radio facilities of this Nation today are monopolized—I may say from information that has come to me—by the administration. There is today, from what I can learn, a radio censorship as rigid as the censorship practiced in any land ruled by an absolute dictator.

I have here, as emphasizing this fact, a statement contained in an article appearing in the New York Times of March 19, 1933, which is brief, and I desire to read it because it bears on the subject I am discussing. It is as follows:

> Assurance of full and complete cooperation has been given directly to the President, to all the members of his Cabinet, and to the leaders of the Senate and House of Representatives. Furthermore, as a matter of public policy during the present emergency, we limit broadcasts of public events and discussions of public questions by ascertaining that such programs are not contrary to the policies of the United States Government.

This statement was incorporated in an article in the New York Times of the date above indicated by its radio editor, Orrin E. Dunlap, Jr., to the effect that radio looms as President Roosevelt's moderized big stick.

In other words, Mr. President, so far as radio is concerned, the people of the United States can only get one side of the question over their broadcasting facilities; that is, the side of the administration. No one over those facilities will dare criticize the administration, according to their own statement.

On May 27, 1933, Walter E. Myers, of Boston, New England representative of the National Broadcasting Co., general manager of WBZ, Boston, and WBZA, Springfield, Mass., addressed a letter to the Massachusetts Department of the American Legion, as follows:

> It has just come to my attention that in recent speeches presented over WBZ and WBZA of the National Broadcasting Co., Inc., spokesmen for the Massachusetts State Department, American Legion, have ignored one of the important regulations of this company.
> Upon more than one occasion your speakers have departed from the text submitted to our officials in advance of the broadcast for review and approval. In other words, the manuscripts we have seen and approved have not been the ones broadcast.
> This practice seems to me in violation of the spirit and terms under which we have given you radio time.
> We cannot condone repeated actions of this kind, and we are thus forced to the unpleasant expedient of denying the present State administration of the American Legion further use of our facilities, except as its requests for time on these stations are approved in writing by national headquarters of the American Legion.

The American Legion in its patriotic support of the United States Government has always had, and shall always continue to have, the privilege of presenting its views over these stations. But we are obliged to impose regulatory and prohibitory "rules of the game." These are prescribed by our editorial policy, customary among all broadcasting stations, and have their origin in regulations of the Federal Radio Commission.

Particularly at a time of national crisis, we believe that any utterance on the radio that tends to disturb the public confidence in its President is a disservice to the people themselves and is hence inimical to the national welfare.

That is what those radio people believe, though the air belongs to the people. The people ought to have some voice in it, perhaps.

The letter continues:

Obviously, as a great and powerful agency for the service of the public, these stations cannot become a party to attacks on the national security.

Mr. President, inquiry at the headquarters of the Massachusetts Department of the American Legion developed the fact that the only recent address delivered over those two stations was one delivered by Harold P. Redden. This speech was critical of the regulations drawn up under the provisions of the so-called "National Economy Act", regulations drastically reducing benefits to veterans. Mr. Redden, of the American Legion, after the letter was received from Mr. Myers, stated:

No one in the State department has ever attacked the President personally. In my address I said specifically, "I do not presume to criticize the President."

Mr. President, when did we get to a point where one does not dare criticize the President? Is he now a dictator to the extent that no one dare criticize him? Apparently he cannot be criticized; no critical word can be uttered against him, in connection with the radio facilities of the country. In the case I have just referred to, Mr. Redden did not even criticize the President, according to Mr. Redden's own statement, but just the same, the American Legion was denied further use of the facilities, except under certain difficult restrictions with which they were forced to comply.

In commenting upon this order denying representatives of the American Legion use of the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. unless they permitted their speeches to be censored by the National Broadcasting Co., the Springfield Republican closed a lengthy editorial as follows:

As for the National Broadcasting Co.'s dictum that there shall be no radio utterance tending to disturb the public's confidence in its President and hence inimical to the national welfare, particularly at a time of national crisis—if that is offered as a general principle, there are two objections to its acceptance. First, it attempts to interpret the present national crisis as the equivalent of war, when, in fact, the Nation is not at war.

Mr. President, this censorship apparently began almost immediately with the advent of the present administration, and it has continued right up to the moment, only becoming more rigorous as time goes by.

Following is a story appearing in the New York Herald Tribune of November 2, 1933:

CHARGES FEAR OF FARLEY PROMPTED BAN ON SPEECH—ROCHESTER ASSEMBLYMAN ASSAILS RADIO STATION MANAGEMENT

ROCHESTER, November 1.—Assemblyman Richard L. Saunders today charged in a statement that he had been given a raw deal and had been ruled off the air by the management of station WHAM because of criticism of Postmaster General James A. Farley in a speech prepared for delivery last night in answer to an address Monday night by the Democratic leader.

Assemblyman Saunders said he had presented his speech for approval, and had been asked if it could not be toned down.

This article is now referring to Mr. Farley. It is necessary to tone down a speech to be delivered in answer to a speech made by James A. Farley, who is the Postmaster General, the king maker, perhaps the dictator maker, and who is also the dispenser of patronage, so we are informed, and national chairman of the Democratic campaign committee; also State chairman of the Democratic campaign committee in New York, and most recently the backer of the "Recovery" ticket in the city of New York.

I am just reminded that Mr. Farley insisted at the time of the mayoralty election in New York that Mr. McKee, "Honest Joe", should be elected mayor of New York. But the voters refused to be driven and, lo and behold, a few days later LaGuardia was elected. That must have been a shock to the national chairman. Recently, in the last day or two, I noticed he made a speech on a nonpolitical occasion in Cleveland, I think it was, in which he suggested in effect that anyone who dared criticize the President would be left at home; he would not be permitted to return to the Congress, evidently threatening members of his party on the other side of the Chamber, as well as Senators on this side of the Chamber; well, lo and behold, a few days later he gets his answer from Vermont. Such statements seem to have a way of plaguing the Postmaster General; they fly back in his face; in other words, he is not a very reliable prophet, Mr. President, judged by those two instances. He was criticized apparently by Mr. Saunders.

Assemblyman Saunders said he had presented his speech for approval and had been asked if it could not be toned down. On his reply that it could not, said Saunders, he was told that he could not make the speech.

He was forbidden the air, which belongs to the people, we thought, and not to the Democratic national chairman.

I asked for an explanation, since I had been told by W. Clyde O'Brien, legal counsel for the Stromberg-Carlson Co., owners and operators of the radio station, that the address was not libelous.

"Mr. O'Brien replied", said Saunders, "that W. Roy McCanne, president of the concern, had the success of the Republican campaign at heart, and he felt my speech would do it no good.

"Mr. O'Brien's explanation was obviously a subterfuge. There is no doubt in my mind that the station feared their license might be canceled for criticism of Farley, who is one of the most powerful men in Washington."

I do not know whether Mr. Farley is among the men referred to by the President this morning as being engaged in lobbying activities here at the Capitol, but this reminds me to say that, in my opinion, the lobby committee ought to be revived, resolutions ought to be adopted providing again for such a lobby committee as that we had a few years ago which was presided over so ably by the late distinguished Senator from Arkansas, Mr. Caraway. I think it is again time that we should go into the lobbying activities of these people denounced by the President. However, that is aside from the matter in hand.

Mr. President, I have a confidential letter from sources that I do not care to divulge, because it would do them grave injustice if their names were disclosed; they might even lose whatever business they have in these latter days of near-dictatorship.

I have reason to believe and, I think, following up my tips, can produce concrete evidence that advertisers generally have been so intimidated that they dare not say anything over the air that might even indirectly be construed as not being in harmony with the present administration. I am told of one broadcaster for a very large food product who said something that was so construed, and he was immediately called down for it. I am further advised that other advertisers have directed those in control of their advertising not to use anything that even indirectly refers to the Government or any governmental affairs. This has gone so far that they dare not say a word concerning taxation.

In other words, it is apparently a matter of bludgeoning the country into terror of this tremendous bureaucratic machine that has been created during the past 9 or 10 months.

Mr. President, on the 25th of November the Washington Post of this city carried a story, part of which reads as follows:

The radio publicity campaign, it was learned, is being carried forward under the direction of William Dolph, director of the N.R.A.'s radio division. He has obtained promises from numerous independent broadcasting stations to broadcast news which he collects daily from all Government departments.

Herbert L. Pettey, secretary of the Radio Commission, has been directed to coordinate radio speeches of officials, obtain free time on the air for them from the radio stations licensed by his agency, and with the aid of R. Fred Roper, executive secretary of the Democratic National Committee, revise or censor such speeches with the view to making every word count for the administration.

Pettey was assigned to the job by Postmaster General Farley.

I will read no more from that, Mr. President, but it simply shows how far this censorship of the air has gone.

Perhaps I ought to read a further item in the same story, because of the universal interest it may arouse:

Because there is no satisfactory textbook dealing with the Rooseveltian policies, many of its sponsors are hopeful the forthcoming handbook will find its way into schools throughout the country.

God save the mark! In other words, they are going to have schoolbooks all over the United States explaining the Roosevelt policies to the children coming on, getting them ready, apparently, for the new dynasty.

Mr. President, I shall say no more on that phase of the subject. I turn now to the question of possible censorship of the press and the bridling of free speech in this country. Controversy has been carried on during the last several months between the press, on the one hand, and the Government, on the other, as represented by General Johnson. For the life of me, I have never been able to understand why there should have been any objection to the incorporation of a section in the proposed newspaper code reaffirming the constitutional right of free press and free speech. Yet everybody knows that the administration, for some cause or another, did not want it in there. Of course, it ought to be in; and the American people, I think, will demand that it be placed there.

Mr. President, free speech in the United States must be preserved at any price. Otherwise our liberties are gone.

For the past several weeks a controversy has been raging between the newspapers of the country and Gen. Hugh S. Johnson in which this question is seriously involved. The loquacious general has insisted that the Constitution is sufficient guaranty against executive usurpation, but the press has been equally insistent that a specific free-press reservation be incorporated in the proposed code.

In the controversy that has arisen the American people are vitally concerned. If there is one right on which they have insisted throughout the years, and on which they will continue to insist, it is that of free speech, as guaranteed by the Constitution. Free speech is absolutely impossible without a free and untrammeled press. Because of this fact the people refuse to become excited so long as the press remains unmuzzled and content.

But when the newspapers evidence concern, the people become justly alarmed, for they are aware that one of their most precious rights is seriously imperiled. That the Constitution itself is in danger there can be no doubt in unbiased minds. Evidence accumulates on all sides to substantiate this view. Executive dictatorship is well on the way, and State lines have wellnigh been obliterated. That the President now exercises too much power for the country's welfare is all too evident. That he is constantly reaching out for new and enlarged authority is also within the knowledge of everybody. Give him now the power to throttle the press and his dictatorship is complete.

One may attribute to him the best of motives and still be seriously alarmed. It has been well said that—

The law of nature is not that tyrants make tyranny but that tyranny makes tyrants.

Benevolent and kindly men have, in the history of the past, become the worst of despots.

General Johnson says he has no intention of attempting to muzzle the press, but incidents connected with his own administration tend to controvert that statement, and whether he be well intentioned or not, the fact remains that he should not be given any semblance of such power.

Radio facilities, controlled by the Government, are now practically monopolized by administration propaganda, and it is the confident belief of many observers that all sorts of difficulties are placed in the way of those who would use the air to oppose administration policies.

We want no such governmental control of the other news sources of the country. Otherwise free speech will have gone, the day of political prisoners will have returned, and liberty will have vanished. The Constitution will then have become a memory.

Because of the seriousness of the situation, a section guaranteeing inviolability of the press in the proposed newspaper code becomes vastly important. Even such a section would not necessarily avail against pretended necessities for martial law, suspension of constitutional guaranties, and the possible development in the minds of our rulers of the idea that they are "Heaven-sent." But for whatever it is worth, such a reservation should be insisted on, and the people, whose liberties are at stake, should be the most outspoken of all in saving their rights which can only be preserved by a free press.

Since the issue has again been raised, it might be profitable to glance briefly at the past.

HISTORICAL SURVEY OF PRESS FREEDOM

Freedom of speech and of the press was not guaranteed originally by the Constitution. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney in the negotiations proposed a free-press clause, but to this suggestion Sherman said:

It is unnecessary * * * the power of Congress does not extend to the press.

Pinckney explained in the South Carolina House of Representatives that the Constitution did not need a free-press clause, although he himself always championed its inclusion.

Alexander Hamilton said a free-press clause was unnecessary—

* * * Why, for instance, should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which the restriction can be imposed?

Hamilton later became a great champion of a free press.

Thomas Jefferson, fearing the tyranny of a strong central government, especially under the power that authorized Congress to pass all laws "necessary and proper" to carry out other delegated powers, fought for free speech and free press. The battle was won, and the first amendment carries the guaranty of free speech and of free press.

MODERN PARALLEL TO EARLY BATTLE FOR PRESS FREEDOM

The battle for a free-press guaranty has a modern counterpart in the struggle between the newspaper publishers and the N.R.A. code authorities.

The publishers insisted on a special section in the code preserving the inviolability of free press, while General Johnson charged criticism of possible abridgment of free press with being a "synthetic dead-cat."

In a few speeches and interviews General Johnson took occasion to discuss possible peril to a free press because of the code. He said he regarded such a section—guaranteeing press freedom—as superfluous. As late as December 7, 1933, before the National Association of Manufacturers in New York, General Johnson said:

As a matter of fact, there has been inserted in every draft of the newspaper code that has been submitted a special provision requested by the newspaper-publishers committee making special reference to the inviolability of the freedom of the press. We have regarded this as superfluous, but the newspapers so eagerly asked for it that I don't know why it should be denied—it has about as much meaning as "eeny meeny miney mo."

Deputy Administrator Lindsay Rogers said the newspaper publishers should have a clause guaranteeing a free press if they wanted it.

Here in General Johnson's reply is a curious parallel to that given by Roger Sherman to Charles Cotesworth Pinckney in the Constitutional Convention.

MINNESOTA v. NEAR CASE

A few years ago an attempt was made to gag a little paper up in Minnesota for publication of allegedly politically pernicious statements. Through operation of the Minnesota gag law an attempt was made to suppress this paper.

The case was carried to the United States Supreme Court, and by a 5-to-4 decision the Court upheld freedom of the press only insofar as "previous restraints" were concerned.

The Court said in effect in that case, by a majority of one, "* * * that the main purpose of the provisions of the first amendment to the Constitution was to 'prevent all these "previous restraints"' upon publications as had been practiced by other governments, and they do not prevent the subsequent punishment of such as may be deemed contrary to the public welfare."

HISTORY OF FREEDOM OF PRESS AND SPEECH IN THE UNITED STATES

America's first newspaper, Publick Occurrences, in 1690, was suppressed for not having a license. The first printer in Pennsylvania was forbidden to publish without a license.

The fountainhead of free press in America is the famous Zenger case. In 1734 John Peter Zenger, publisher of the New York Journal, published two satirical songs, and the heavy hand of the law clamped down on him.

After the grand jury refused to indict him, he was arrested by warrant of the council. His attorneys who came to his defense were disbarred. But one Andrew Hamilton, ablest advocate of the time, appeared for Zenger and obtained an acquittal. So effective was Hamilton's masterly speech that Zenger was not only acquitted but there was established the principle that the jury could determine every question before it; that the law of England was not the law of New York. Thus the principle of press freedom was established in America before it was in England.

The first appearance of the free-press ideal in constitutional form appeared in rhetorical article XII of the Virginia Declaration of Rights, which said:

> The freedom of the press is one of the great bulwarks of liberty and can never be restrained but by despotic governments.

In 1798 the infamous Sedition Act was passed and was roundly condemned by James Madison and Thomas Jefferson.

Referring to press freedom, Madison said:

> And can the wisdom of this policy (press freedom) be doubted by anyone who reflects that to the press alone, checkered as it is with abuses, the world is indebted for all the triumphs which have been gained by reason and humanity over error and oppression; who reflects that to the same beneficent source the United States owe much of the lights which conducted them to the rank of a free and independent nation and which have improved their political system into a shape so auspicious to their happiness?

Upon becoming President, Jefferson pardoned those held in jail for violations of the Sedition Act. This infamous legislation was never declared unconstitutional and died of its own limitations in 1801.

MODERN ASPECTS OF PRESS FREEDOM

The New York Times attack on the Tweed Ring was another milestone in the battle for freedom of the press. By intimidation, threats, attempts to indict the publishers, attempts to buy stock, attempts to find a flaw in the property title, the enemies of the Times attempted to suppress the paper. But the newspaper won, and the Tweed Ring was crushed in New York.

Theodore Roosevelt figured in a brief flurry against two of the country's newspapers—the New York World and the Indianapolis News. These papers criticized the President and other high officials in connection with the transfer of title of the Panama Canal from the French company to the United States. President Roosevelt tried to have the editor of the News removed from Indianapolis to Washington for trial, but the district judge refused to allow the transfer. An attempt to prosecute the World was equally unsuccessful.

The old menace to the press, "libel on government", was invoked by the administration of Mayor William Hale Thompson, of Chicago. The city administration sued the Chicago Tribune for a great sum for libeling the government. The Tribune won its case when the Supreme Court of Illinois held that a city cannot sue a newspaper for libel.

CONCLUSION

National emergencies are fraught with dangers, not the least of which is the possibility that some of those temporarily intrusted with power may feel called upon to "rule or ruin."

If obsessed with such an idea, they are apt to stop at nothing to attain their ends. That such possibilities exist today there can be no doubt, and the American people should be on their guard. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Mr. President, I shall say no more on the subject at the present time. I desire, if I may, to offer a resolution. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to offer it and have it read at the desk.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the able Senator if he offers the resolution as a part of his address or does he offer it so that it may receive consideration and be acted on?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am willing to have it go to a committee. It provides for an investigation of radio facilities.

Mr. LEWIS. To what committee does the Senator suggest it should go?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. To the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LEWIS. To that I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Without objection, the resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 146), as follows:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make an investigation of the control exercised by the Federal Radio Commission over persons broadcasting through licensed broadcasting stations, and the extent to which the freedom of speech of such persons has been restricted. The Committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.
> For the purposes of this resolution the Committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-third Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $——, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BANK-DEPOSIT INSURANCE

As in legislative session,

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, last evening, just before adjournment, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] wrote into the RECORD some very interesting figures on bank accounts in this country. They are in the RECORD of this day.

I should like to write into the RECORD, for the benefit of those who are interested in this question of bank accounts and the size of bank accounts in this country, some figures found in the Federal Reserve Bulletin for the month of July 1933, on page 454.

This table is a study of deposits in 5,500 licensed member banks under the Federal Reserve System and was made as of May 13, 1933. It reveals a total of 30,556,105 accounts in these banks. Of this number of accounts, 29,482,384, or 96½ percent of the total number of deposits, were of an average of $189 each; and this vast number of accounts constituted only 23.7 percent of the total deposits in these member banks reporting, although they likewise constituted 96½ percent of the total number of deposits.

I notice the Senator from Michigan in the Chamber. I will say to him that I am reading into the RECORD the figures that I referred to last night in my questions to him.

This study of 5,500 banks indicates that of the total number of 30,556,105 accounts, 569,000 plus accounts, or 1.9 percent of the total number of accounts, represented 8.1 percent of the total deposits, and the average of those accounts was $3,356. These are the accounts running from $2,500 to $5,000.

The number of accounts from $5,000 to $10,000 represented 0.9 of 1 percent of the total number of accounts. The average amount of those accounts was $6,820. There were 269,903 of such bank accounts.

When we get into the higher brackets—and, parenthetically, I may say that I think these studies fairly represent the condition of bank accounts even over the larger field surveyed by the report filed by the Senator from Michigan—the accounts over $5,000, which I assume would include the large commercial accounts in these banks, present an interesting figure.

There were 46,870 of those accounts out of 30,556,105 accounts. They constitutted 0.1 of 1 percent, or approximately 0.001 of the total number of accounts. They represented 44.6 percent of the total amount of deposits in the banks, and the average of each of those accounts was $223,782.

For the benefit of those who may read this reference in the RECORD, I desire to say that it can be procured from the Federal Reserve System and will be found in the bulletin issued in July on the page I have indicated.

I am taking the liberty of writing this into the RECORD so that those who are interested may have the advantage not only of the tables prepared and submitted by the Senator from Michigan but also of the data that are in this very interesting record.

OPERATIONS OF THE N.R.A.

As in legislative session,

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, when one observes those noble things which have been accomplished by reason of the National Recovery Act, he debates long the thought of voicing criticism of the program or of its administration. And when one contemplates the vast possibilities of accomplishment under wise administration of the act, he rebels against doing anything that might threaten in any degree the life of the program. I should hesitate now in offering such criticism as I do but for the fact that a continuation of this national silence toward the program may permit the program to fail and die by reason of its own misdirected effort and its failure to recognize its own possibilities. Therefore, I say what I do from what I wish understood to be a position of friendliness to the generally accepted purposes of N.R.A., and I say it in the hope that I may contribute in a constructive way to the ultimate success of the national recovery program.

Out on the farms of America, where resides about one third of our entire population, there is just cause for the protests which are being voiced against N.R.A. Prices on what the farmer buys have been lifted by N.R.A., while prices paid him for his products remain at a point which increases the tremendous odds which have stood so long in his path. It is unfortunate that A.A.A. could not have moved forward in a way such as would so greatly have improved farm buying power as to offset the higher costs occasioned by N.R.A. I shall not dwell, however, upon farm relationship to N.R.A., except to say that there cannot be abandonment of the industrial recovery program at so advanced a stage as this, even though it proves very oppressive to the agriculturist. Ultimate success for N.R.A. will contribute in no uncertain way to a larger recovery for agriculture. I say this without abandoning my belief that national recovery could have been much more quickly accomplished had there been agricultural recovery first upon which industry could build a more substantial recovery for itself. Lasting healthy recovery can and will come only after agriculture is given such reward as is deserving America's basic and most essential industry.

The National Industrial Recovery Administration is a huge governmental machine with most far-reaching powers, powers second only to those exercised by the Government of Russia. But these powers, it has been emphasized and reemphasized, were not to be feared by anyone, least of all by small business, labor, and the consumer. All would be taken care of, with their rights and interests jealously guarded. Big business would not be allowed to crush small business; in fact, the N.R.A. would make an end of those unfair practices by means of which the small business man was gradually being driven to extinction. The wage earners would be permitted to organize, employers would be protected against undue interference by labor, and the consumer was to be protected against unreasonable and unjustifiable price rises.

It was an understanding such as this which led Congress to accept the recommendation of President Roosevelt without extended debate and which led to the overwhelming affirmative vote given by Congress. Seven months have passed since, on June 16, 1933, by an Executive order the President established the National Recovery Administration to administer the National Recovery Act, an act which we deeply hoped would go far toward ending the depression.

When I voted for this measure, I did so with the very emphatic assurance and understanding that small business men and consumers would be protected against the exploitation and domination by monopolies. The farmer especially was not to lose such gains under the N.R.A. as he might enjoy through the A.A.A.

But what, instead, has happened? Reluctantly I am forced to the conclusion that the power of monopoly has been greatly increased during the stay of N.R.A.; that invitation to monopoly in the United States is greater than ever before. In view of what amounts to suspension of the antitrust laws, the small independent producers, the small business man generally, whether buyer from, competitor of, or seller to large monopolized industries, and the great mass of ultimate consumers, are seemingly without protection other than that given by the N.R.A. And the N.R.A. is not giving this protection. On the contrary, it has strengthened, not weakened, the power of monopoly. Whether this is the decided policy of the administration is unimportant; it is the conclusion to be drawn from its actions.

On January 9 and 10 the N.R.A. conducted hearings on the subject of price changes. The press did not, perhaps could not, indicate the true extent of the monopoly practices which these hearings, developed by the Consumers Advisory Board under an Executive order of the President, have disclosed. I regard the disclosures of this hearing, available in over 1,000 pages of testimony, nothing short of startling. In these pages of hearings is revealed:

First. Domination of small enterprises by the larger.

Second. Fixing of prices by the trade associations.

Third. Intimidation of hesitant members of the association.

Fourth. Fear of the small producers incurring the ill will of the large.

Fifth. Rapid rise of prices to the consumer, in many instances to a higher figure than those of 1929.

It is imperative that every Member of the Senate and of the House peruse these reports. The issue is more than one of satisfying a legitimate interest in how a new and experimental law is working. It touches the very heart of recovery. Unless the conditions disclosed in these hearings are corrected I fear for the success of the entire recovery program. I think at times that these conditions cannot do other than delay and defeat recovery. Let us hope that the hearings will result in reforms within the ranks of the code makers.

In addition to the injustices revealed by the hearings of which I speak, there have come to me hundreds of letters from small and independent businesses in the manufacturing and merchandising field telling of the march of small business to its grave under N.R.A. codes, the writing of which their monopolistic competitors have dominated.

Unless the N.R.A. is prepared to correct these conditions quickly, a full and searching congressional study is necessary to determine possible amendments such as will cause the act to effectively serve the people and not the profit takers and monopolies.

One of the most vicious examples of coercion by a large monopoly of small producers is the domination by the General Electric Co. In the formation and administration of the electrical code the dominant position of the General Electric Co. as a producer of incandescent lamps is not only maintained but strengthened.

The electrical manufacturers' code was fostered by the National Electrical Manufacturers' Association, known as "N.E.M.A.", which is dominated by General Electric. When a code for this industry came in order, a former General Electric employee was found taking an office in N.R.A. headquarters as an adviser to the deputy administrator in charge of this particular code. A code is approved almost before the small competitors know what is going on. The former General Electric employee leaves his post at N.R.A. and becomes the Washington representative of N.E.M.A. Awakened to what has taken place, the independents in the industry strive for 2 months to win consideration of a supplemental code at N.R.A. They are finally told by N.R.A. that their supplemental code can be considered by the N.R.A. only if and when it is presented by the N.E.M.A. code authority, which is the General Electric Co. Mr. Swope, of General Electric, is asked to sit down and talk things over with these independents. He does so, and assures the independents that he will submit the suggested supplement to the code to the General Electric authorities.

The independents naturally protested all this play in a way which finally resulted in N.R.A. opening the N.E.M.A. code for rehearing. Let it be said that a very fine hearing was given the independent cause by N.R.A. early this month. But after a day or two of hearings further hearings were postponed to the end of the month.

Much depends upon the action which the N.R.A. finally takes in reforming the N.E.M.A. code. A very positive issue of N.R.A. policy is involved. It should be said that N.R.A. authorities seem to have sensed the injustice involved in N.E.M.A. activities and its code.

In connection with this electrical manufacturers' code, there was developed at the recent price-change hearings a most illuminating example of monopoly coercion under N.R.A. It was furnished by Mr. J. W. Nicholson, purchasing agent for the city of Milwaukee. Said he (p. 561, vol. 2):

> I have a case that I should like to discuss. Under the heading of "lamps", we (the city of Milwaukee) received 9 bids; 5 of them were identical and 3 others were identical but slightly lower, and 1 bid lower than that. * * * Specifications had been prepared by the city from data obtained from laboratory and field tests which the city had made * * * and we asked for bids to obtain those particular results, so that instead of buying merely bulbs we were buying lamp life; we were buying a lamp which consumes the least amount of current and lasts the longest. * * * Such specifications have always been accepted up to this time.
> Now, coming down to the bids which were received on December 15, our specifications used at that time had been previously submitted to several engineers of electrical firms, who had offered no objection to them. In fact, several of them stated that the specifications were the most complete that they had ever seen. Nevertheless, when the bids were received all of the firms, except three, took exception to the specifications, and those three were independents, so-called, stating that they could not comply with them and offering specifications of their own instead. * * *
> This was done, we were told, on orders from someone in the General Electric organization who, it appears, was under the impression that the N.R.A. electrical code permitted him to dictate the terms and specifications on which electric-lamp manufacturers operating under General Electric patents could quote. Of the three bids which complied with the city's specifications, two were accepted. One was ruled out because we had not tried the lamps and did not know what they could do. * * * One of the two firms accepted was given $20,000 worth of building lamps, * * * the other firm was given $30,000 worth of street-lighting lamps. Directly following the award of these contracts approximately $5,000 worth of lamps were purchased from the first firm and $20,000 from the second. That was in order to get money out of the 1933 funds and get those lamps to use. We had been holding off for some time on this because our specifications took us some time to prepare and to get straightened out with the various electrical firms. Directly following the placing of these orders the firm which had the $30,000 contract came to our office and with a representative of the central company—and when I say the central company I mean the patent-holding company—and this representative examined the bid and then on the following day the contractor wrote the following letter—mind you, he had a contract for $30,000 worth of lamps, and it has always been my impression that when a man got a contract he was extremely happy and very willing to fill it. Everyone has said that business is so rotten, and when you get an order for $30,000 you ought to be tickled to death, to say the least.
> However, this is the letter:
>
> "Relative to your letter of December 26 we are returning herewith your order no. 2771, together with your formal contract forms in triplicate unsigned, inasmuch as we are compelled to do so by our suppliers, the incandescent lamp department of the General Electric Co. They have refused to ship lamps ordered by us on your orders nos. 2732, 2733, 2735, 2737, and 2738, stating that our bid was irregular in that your specifications conflicted with those of the incandescent lamp department, and that we, as their agents, were not permitted to accept this business. It is extremely unfortunate that this situation has occurred, but under the conditions as outlined above we are compelled by our source of supply to withdraw our bid."
> We then awarded the entire contract to the firm that had the $20,000 business, and we ordered the bond of the $30,000 contractor forfeited. It was a $1,000 bond, and he has to suffer that loss or the surety company has, who has signed the bond.
> Now, the gentlemen who received the $50,000 contract, the combined contract, called me up and said that they had been told that they were going to have difficulty delivering these lamps, but they were going to wait and see what happened at this meeting before they shut down on them.
> So, if you gentlemen will just hold up our hands I think he will be able to deliver the lamps.

Thus we see how a giant monopoly, General Electric, uses an N.R.A. code, which it was instrumental in writing, to further entrench itself in a program of compelling the public to take what they will sell, not what the public wants; a program of destroying whatever remains of competition in its own field.

The steel code brought testimony concerning the manner in which small fabricators of steel are being practically eliminated from the field on the Pacific coast. One of the lesser manufacturers in this field stated in the recent price hearings:

> Since the mill code is in effect, mill warehouses have adopted jobbers' prices and no longer concede the small legitimate structural fabricator any concessions to price. This section of the country has numerous small fabricators who build up their business because of the price concession * * * now that the prices are raised these small fabricators are practically eliminated from the field.
> If this concession can still be granted us by the mills we can continue in business; if not, then either we close up or buy foreign steel which is brought in and sold at the warehouse regardless of quantity at prices averaging from $8 to $12 below American steel quoted f.o.b. Pittsburgh. This explains why foreign steel tonnage is so much greater in proportion on the Pacific coast than elsewhere.
> "Hi-Ten" steel, used in the manufacture of oil derricks, is said to have increased 400 percent in price under the steel code. Says the complainant to the N.R.A.:
>
> "Is this following the President's instructions wherein he says:
> "'Prices shall be increased only sufficiently to cover the increased cost of doing business?'"

Four steel manufacturers simultaneously raised the price of flat steel wire to $11 a ton and announced $16 eventually. This had cost $6 before. "It is unfair that the big companies, with their tremendous overhead, be permitted to force the price to a point where we cannot use this material, and it prevents us from giving tonnage to the smaller concerns who can manufacture the wire profitably at a cost within our reach and whose employees need the work more than the employees in the larger companies", said one business man in a letter to N.R.A.

Under the leadership of the big companies, "small concerns are profiting beyond their wildest dreams", it is charged in the record. Elsewhere it is testified that high prices for "cold-rolled strip steel at $15.055 will wreck a business we have been 47 years building up."

Here is a small steel manufacturer who protests against the discrimination and extortionate practices of the Steel Trust:

I am attaching herewith several typewritten sheets, the first one of which is a copy of section 7, article VI, of the steel code, and, as you will notice at the end of this paragraph, it distinctly states "and to the end that the President may be assured that the code and the administration thereof do not promote or permit monopolies or monopolistic practices, or eliminate or oppress small enterprises, or operate to discriminate against them."

The steel companies in setting up these extras (extra charges for tool steel) have done just the reverse.

Tool-steel prices rose from 21 percent to 41 percent over the old prices, with heavy quantity discounts that favor the large buyers, it was charged.

One small steel-tool manufacturer who addressed a complaint to the Consumers' Advisory Board sent the following letter:

When we originally wrote you on September 20 we informed a company that we used their price list as an exhibit. They threatened to sue us for any expense which may be accrued by them in defending our charge against the tool-steel industry. This, in our opinion, is another step by which the large corporations are discriminating against the smaller corporations, and which we believe is unfair.

Incidentally, Mr. President, I think perhaps that particular threat is more or less common throughout industry where monopoly seeks to fasten its tentacles a little more deeply into the business that can be had in that industry.

Complaints were received against blast furnaces, rolling mills, converting mills, and against nearly everything in the steel industry. Yet the answer of the American Iron and Steel Institute to these small business men was merely this:

Don't bring your complaints to the Consumers' Board; come to us.

In other words, if gangsters give one trouble, let there be no complaint to the police; instead, let the one troubled take his complaint to the gangsters themselves. That is what that kind of code provision accomplishes.

Here we have a case where price lifts in the steel industry are to be investigated. Who is to do the investigating under the code? Why the code authority, and that authority consists of the men and interests who wrote the code and who are of the monopoly end of the industry.

So we see how under N.R.A. we reward the pirates. Or have we forgotten the part played by some of these pirates, notably the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, in the selfish, greedy, grafting years which some still refer to as our years of greatest American prosperity? Have we forgotten the thefts in the name of bonuses in which Mr. Schwab, Mr. Grace, and other executives of Bethlehem Steel engaged?

The cement industry offers another example of what is hoped for, under the N.R.A. program, by men who have played business hogs for so long. In their effort to accomplish approval of a code they made bold to suggest such power delegated to them as would permit them to say "yes" or say "no" to any proposal which would afford competition beyond that which already exists. In other words, they wanted the right to veto any project which would find new cement mills of modern design erected in competition with their plants which, in large measure, are obsolete. Fortunately, the cement code, as finally approved, gives this power finally into the hands of the President, and not alone to the code authorities.

Here, then, we find the pirates of other days conceiving the "new deal" to be that of maintaining the order which prevailed back a few years ago when false values were being written into the capitalization of their institutions.

Recalling more specifically one instance wherein, a few years ago, New York investment bankers made purchase of two cement manufacturing plants for approximately $3,000,000 and then went on to the New York Stock Exchange and sold the merger of these two plants to the American public for $9,000,000, we find them now stubbornly fighting to so conduct the cement manufacturing business that they can pay reasonable dividends upon the fictitious values they then created. Thus far N.R.A. has done nothing to prevent the realization of dreams of that kind.

In other words, those who have had a large voice in determining code policies under N.R.A. would, if the truth were known, conduct their every step to the accomplishment of restoration of that old order which resulted so emphatically in our downfall and in the depression which is still upon us. They seem to deem that though N.R.A. is intended to decrease production there must be maintenance of dividends even upon that decreased production.

If excessive capitalization is going to be protected in any way through this recovery program, failure is spelled even before a start is made. It seems to me that the N.R.A. is in a delightful position to accomplish the elimination of the water that has been poured into industry as capital during our so-called "boom years." If, however, the N.R.A. does not perceive this power, then it would seem to be the duty of Congress to write more specific legislation which would prevent any undertaking to effect industrial recovery on the basis of the fictitious values of other years.

Consider the paper industry code. The Consumers Advisory Board, in a comprehensive study made of the paper industry, reported price increases ranging from 25 to 150 percent, a uniformity of prices over a wide area, and discriminations against certain classes of trade. The master code for the paper and pulp industry was signed by the President on November 17. But these manufacturers did not wait for that. They fixed prices long before, and made themselves criminally liable, in my opinion, by their eagerness to extort profits in an industry that had shown little effect from the depression in this respect compared with so many others.

Price increases of the most used items of paper ranged from 70 to 100 percent, which neither the cost of labor nor the increased cost of materials could account for. The prices rose most sharply as the codes went into effect. Local dealers confessed themselves helpless in the hands of the supply houses, feeling the price increases were mandatory and that if they did not comply they would lose their source of supply. Here was price fixing on a national basis.

The National Stationers' Association, at its Cincinnati convention, adopted a program, designed to cooperate with President Roosevelt in his recovery plans. They, therefore, announced on August 1 a general price increase of loose-leaf books, and so forth, of 15 percent. Says one small business man in a complaint which he dared not address to the paper code authority:

The mills and jobbers are in close alliance. The jobbers have a 100-percent organization and prices are the same in the four houses in Louisville. The suspension of the antitrust law has made them racketeers.

The wholesale paper houses of the Pacific Northwest have a powerful combination, it seems, which the Federal Trade Commission should proceed to investigate at once. On June 26, long before there was any paper code—the code for the paper-distributing industry was only signed on December 24—this is what took place, according to a complainant:

Up until a short time ago we have been able to buy papers in the open market on a competitive basis. Now we are informed by the paper wholesale firms collectively that they stand together and have but one price. This, we understand, is in line with what President Roosevelt had in mind in his stabilization act, but to become effective only when legal associations had been formed and required codes submitted to and approved by the Government.

Apparently, a combination of wholesale paper houses of the Northwest has been formed in restraint of trade, with the sole purpose of boosting prices, and when the prices have been boosted to an unreasonable level, to submit their code to the Government and take their modest advances from the then inflated prices.

Paper prices have made three advances in the past 30 days.

This testimony is only about a week old.

This spread is extremely unreasonable, if true, and will surely put all the small printers out of business.

Pointing to the same group, another small business man writes:

The wholesale paper houses of the Pacific Northwest have already formed their combination in restraint of trade. In addition to this they have arranged their classifications so that the small printer will be forced out of business. As far as we know, they have not yet formed their legal associations with the required approval of the Government before the antitrust laws are suspended in their case, but they have gone wild in their flagrant and outrageous actions.

What do you think of price rises from 44 percent to 150 percent?

Salesmen were sent out from these houses to call on the trade.

"All of these gentlemen prefaced their remarks", wrote one man to the Consumers' Board, "by saying that they were helpless on price which was dictated by the association. 'We all have one price,' they said. 'This action has been taken with the approval of the President. It is part of the recovery program.'"

What things, Mr. President, are being done! And always with the assertion by the highwaymen in each instance that their acts are approved by the President.

Not all business men are taking part in this ignoble attempt to hold up the consuming public, but even they who are honest will be compelled by the monopolistic tendencies under the codes to force the public to "pay the piper"—big business. Here is an example of a patriotic American—a victim of the codes. He writes:

NOVEMBER 22, 1933.

CONSUMERS' ADVISORY BOARD,
National Recovery Administration, Washington, D.C.

GENTLEMEN: While we are in agreement with the intent of the National Recovery Act, we are very much disturbed by the actions of a number of our sources of supply, who claim their policies have been dictated by N.R.A.

We have reference particularly to those companies manufacturing the same class of material who are quoting identical prices. Steel, for instance; we use a large tonnage of cold-rolled steel and vitreous enameling stock, and quotations from every producer of these types of steel are the same, with increases over previous costs as high as 35 percent. Is it the intent of the N.R.A. to countenance the fixing of selling prices?

On shipping crates our costs have advanced from 40 to 60 percent since the N.R.A. was put into force, and on cartons our costs have jumped as high as 100 percent. We could go on indefinitely.

We manufacture products for sale to other manufacturers and for sale through distributors to the public, and while our costs have increased due to increased wages and material costs, our selling prices have remained practically stationary.

We believe in this way we are standing squarely behind the N.R.A. in endeavoring to increase purchasing power and employment.

We cannot, however, maintain this position indefinitely, if our sources of supply are allowed by the Government to band together, forcing us to accept materially increased fixed prices.

Unfortunate, indeed, Mr. President, is the plight of many small business men. Their case merits our understanding and such effort as would naturally follow in their defense. But what of the buying public—the people, schools, and municipalities?

Here are excerpts from letters that were revealed at the price-changes hearing to show what the average man and woman, the man and woman who cannot come to Washington to lobby to protect their interests and those of their families have to contend with when nobody is protecting them under the codes and the code authorities:

We do a great deal of our business with transportation people who consist of bus drivers and trolleymen. In fact, we are under contract with these people in selling them their shirts. These people do not get large enough salaries to pay us for this apportioned rate per shirt.

The retail selling price was $1.75 per shirt. The new selling price would have to be $3. This would be impossible for us to do as we could not offer shirts at such an increased selling price.

Alabama: Overalls we formerly sold for 95 cents; if we ask a customer $1.45 he runs out, as he really is not able to pay that much for one pair of overalls.

Florida: Florida is not a wheat-, cotton-, or corn-growing country, and we are receiving no benefits of the advances of farm products at this time of the year. At the prices we are obliged to pay for merchandise and mark a reasonable profit, and then sell to the retailer, it is almost impossible for the average consumer to purchase his actual requirements, much less luxuries.

Philadelphia: I cannot double my former selling price in my neighborhood—I am sure I cannot get it, as the majority of the people living here are still unemployed.

In the 7 months since the N.R.A. got under way it is hard to calculate how many millions of dollars the Nation, the several States, and the many municipalities have had to pay in excess of reasonable costs for materials as the results of matched bids and loss of discounts revealed at the price hearings. We all owe a debt of gratitude to the city of Milwaukee for exposing the coercion attempted on it by the General Electric Co.'s lamp department and for revealing other raids. Here are some of the most flagrant hold-ups:

From Milwaukee comes this account: Budget reduced 24 percent over 1933, facing price increases as high as 100 percent. Julius Ruyler, N.R.A. administrator for Milwaukee, charged with ordering every industry that sells the city to agree on uniform prices. The result was the city received identical bids on its contracts in the following number:

On bids for Portland cement; 5 identical bids; armored cable, 9 identical bids (one accountant prepared them all); fiber conduit, 5 identical bids (referred to Federal Trade Commission—no action); chlorine, 8 fair bids; 1928—this April, 6 identical bids; steel pipe, 11 identical bids.

From Dallas comes the information that under the codes "50 local printers fixed contract in a central office, alike to a penny. City started its own print shop."

From Los Angeles comes this information: Brick no. 1 common, 6 identical bids. Jackhammer drills, all bids identical at $190; actual cost to make, $40. Paper delivery held up by Pacific coast mills under code to prevent mills nearby to deliver more quickly than distant mills "regardless of fact that idle printers could be put to work more promptly." Such a clause in the code surely cannot be in accord with the President's desire to expedite employment. Automobiles must b epaid for at full retail price; formerly 20-percent discount.

From Baltimore came information that the bids are uniform and the price increases ranged from 19 percent to 156 percent. When one stops to consider that all municipalities have cut to the bone in the matter of budgeting, these increases up to 156 percent do constitute a burden almost beyond their ability to bear.

From New York State comes the statement:

Faced with the necessity of balancing the budget and wishing to cooperate with N.R.A., the State under codes is not permitted to get the customary quantity discounts, bringing an additional burden on the taxpayers of the following amounts totaling $750,000: Automobiles, $50,000; furniture, $250,000; gasoline, $200,000; coal, $200,000.

Their criticism is as follows:

The codes do not go far enough in establishing fair trade practices to the ultimate consumer.

Then speaking of experience in the Nation, here in Washington is the case of our own Government Printing Office, which reports the prices for book cloth and buckram 116 to 140 percent higher than previous purchases and that the bids are practically identical with proposals not to allow discounts.

From universities and schools there have come astounding tales of increased hardship under N.R.A. policies. Hundreds of universities and colleges cry "Hold-up" under the codes. Their case was presented by the Educational Buyers Association. They charged in the recent hearing:

(1) Refusal of discounts for quantity purchases.
(2) Refusal of discounts for cash.
(3) Matched or identical prices.
(4) Excessive prices; increases from 10 to 70 percent.

Purdue University said:

Provisions in the code impose tremendous advances in prices in the face of the struggle to meet a difficult financial situation in the carrying out of a grave social responsibility.

Closed doors have marked all proceedings to date, in most instances at least, and the consumer's viewpoint outside of your door has not been requested. Broad consumer representation coupled with standard quality of product provisions will go a long way to place the consumer on an equal footing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NYE. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to know whether it is the Senator's suggestion that this uniformity of bidding at these higher levels is, first, a result of voluntary action on the part of the bidders taking advantage of the code; or, second, the requirement of the code itself?

Mr. NYE. My better judgment would tell me that the matter is one primarily of the bidders taking advantage of the code, the code being drawn sufficiently loose to permit such advantage to be taken. The difficulty, it seems to me, lies in the fact that the N.R.A. as a representative of the Government has not given the people the kind of representation that would protect the consumers' interests.

Mr. VANDENBERG. If there is a minimum price necessitated by the code, and all bidders submit the minimum, obviously there will have to be uniformity of bids. If any bidder underbids the minimum imposed by the code, he is penalized under the code, is he not?

Mr. NYE. I understand that to be the case. To that extent the code or the Government in permitting the code is directly responsible for these fixed prices.

From Harvard University came testimony that the students are compelled to pay 20 to 30 percent more for microscopes, and the statement was made:

Representatives of two large laboratory supply houses claimed that they would stop price chiseling and when asked who were the price chiselers replied, "The small dealers with small stocks and low overhead and who make their profits on their smaller sales."

From New York University came the following statement:

I was told some leader appointed in the field maintained that the type of pencil which ordinarily has sold for $2.10 a gross can no longer be sold in this country but must be sold in foreign countries. It means the university will be forced to pay $3.75 per gross.

So we can go on manufacturing pencils to supply the needs of those abroad less able to pay the higher costs, but our own people are going to be required to pay the higher costs for anything they have to buy.

Once again, from the farmer's standpoint:

The improvement in the farmer's relative position, which seemed so promising in June and July under the influence of the operation of the A.A.A., has been very largely wiped out since June by the operation of the N.R.A.—

testified a Washington representative of a large farm organization, and his figures proved it. He continued:

We recognized that the method of administering the N.R.A. and the attitude of the administrators would be the all important determining factor. We heartily commended the principle of abolishing child labor, and favored the principle of spreading the available work among a greater number of workers. We recognized the need for increased wages in certain industries. But we also recognized that the N.R.A. opened the door to business and labor to do things which they have tried for years to do, but were restrained from doing either by reason of the antitrust laws or by their inability to persuade Congress. We recognized further that the consumer, being for the most part inarticulate, would be the victim. Note what happened.

About the end of July the N.R.A. codes began to get in their influence. We know of several instances where manufacturers, secure in the belief that the adoption of their codes would bring much higher prices proceeded at once and without waiting for the adoption of their code, to agree to raise prices. Lumber and certain other building materials doubled or more than doubled in price. Wholesale prices increased from 50 to 144 percent between March and October. A portion of this is justified. At all events, the farmer in common with other consumers, must pay all these increases in costs and selling prices.

The net result is that the purchasing power of the farmers' crops has fallen to an index figure of 57.7 after having reached a high of 71 back in July; in other words, the improvement in the farmer's relative position, which seemed so promising in June and July under the influence of the operation of the A.A.A. has been very largely wiped out since June by the operation of the N.R.A. This has been made possible by the codes as approved by the administrators of the N.R.A.

Perhaps these are not days in which to expect any large measure of consistency. There is some amusement, however, in the question in conjunction with code making.

National trade associations largely constitute the code authority in each case. It is the voice of the association that usually determines what shall and what shall not be in a code. In the making of the electrical manufacturing code, General Electric, dominating the national association, was boss. When it came to a code for the playing-card manufacturing industry, a slightly different tune prevails.

There are but seven playing-card manufacturers in the country. They have a national association. This association prepared and submitted a code to become a part of the graphic arts code. The association membership was unanimous in support of the code of fair practices submitted; but this appendix did not become a part of the graphic arts code as submitted to the President alone because there was one manufacturer who opposed it, and that one manufacturer was the only manufacturer in the United States who was not a member of the Playing Card Manufacturers' Association.

In the case of the General Electric Corporation, because they dominated their national association, they dominated and positively dictated what should be in the electrical manufacturers' code, simply through dominating and controlling the national association. Now comes the national playing-card association, striving to do much the same thing, and they are prevented from doing it because one in their industry who is not affiliated as a member of the association objects to the code.

It is interesting to note that in this particular case the one who objected was the monopoly member of the playing-card industry, the member that was controlling about 60 percent of the entire playing-card production. So, whether you are in or whether you are out of the national association, the power seems to remain with monopoly, no matter in what industry it may be found, to determine whether or not there is going to be a code, and what shall be in that code.

In all fairness, it should be said that when this playing-card case was called to the attention of the National Recovery Administration, they did take immediate steps, and within the last few days called together all the parties at interest, all of the manufacturers, and sought to get them to agree upon a code, and succeeded finally. They succeeded as well in accomplishing an agreement as to who should be upon that code authority. Strangely, the code authority in this case consists of four men. Two of them are to be named by the National Playing Card Association, which represents six playing-card manufacturers in the United States. The other two are to be named by the United States Playing Card Co., which is the monopolistic member in that particular industry. It remains to be seen how long that sort of a set-up is going to last. I have reason to believe, however, that the National Recovery Administration is determined to see to it that fair play is afforded the smaller producers in this field. I hope they will stick to the assurance they have given, even though it should fall upon them, by attacking the monopolist in this particular case and making a very shining example of him.

The Associated General Contractors, protesting the lumber and timber products code, charged that—

Despite safeguards, the price of lumber set for the mills has boosted the basic wholesale prices to levels above the highest boom-time prices since war days.

The result has been what is alleged to be a final collapse of the lumber market.

When the lumber-manufacturing industry was given a code, it invited and had the pretty general backing of the lumber mills throughout the country, large and small alike. From one such manufacturer, operating down in Texas, there came to me a very interesting letter revealing the experience that had been his. He was the owner of two mills. If I remember rightly, his name was O'Shaughnessey. He was the owner of two mills; and through fair weather and foul, through good times and bad, he has managed to keep those mills operating. He has managed to keep his men employed at reasonably decent rates of wage. He concurred in the code. He affiliated. He did everything he was asked to do to go along and to cooperate in this recovery program.

Within 2 weeks of the time that code was approved, within 2 weeks of the time the code authority was named—and here, again, we have a code written by the big-business end of the lumber-manufacturing industry, dictated by them, and now administered by them as members of the code authority—2 weeks after that code authority was named, Mr. O'Shaughnessey was advised that under the code they were going to compel him to close one of his two mills. Continuing to cooperate, he closed it, though he wondered, and rightfully so, whether his big brother competitors were closing half of their operations in what seemed to be a program of limiting production. He closed his mill; but one morning, not many days later, after he had been trying day after day to explain this closing to the satisfaction of his employees, he awakened to find the smoke rolling out of the stack of that closed mill and discovered a new kind of strike in existence, a strike which found the former employees taking possession of that mill, steaming up, and operating it; more than that, sending a telegram to General Johnson, of N.R.A., asking him what he was going to do about it.

Mr. President, I do not know what has been the outcome of that case. I think nothing at all has been done with respect to it; but it gives only a little inkling of what is in store for men, what is in store particularly for small business, if this N.R.A. code trend continues without any interruption, without any questioning, as it has continued since its inception.

Knowledge that the N.R.A. is about to reopen and study all codes lends encouragement to such as have feared that under N.R.A. big business was on its way to still bigger business, and that the present program was one to build bigger and stronger monopoly. If there can and will be a strong hand exercised at N.R.A. in the reconsideration of these codes, we shall see selfishness and greed driven from the temple of N.R.A., and the accomplishment of such codes as will protect and aid the small business man, aid labor, and aid the consumer. In its present state N.R.A. and many of its codes are termed "swindles upon consumers", and not altogether without cause in many instances.

It must be evident that fear has been a very large element in code experiences thus far. Many communications I have received beg that the identity of the writing small manufacturer be not revealed. Thousands want corrections made and remedies afforded, but few are daring openly to fight for that which is plainly their right and nothing more than fair play.

I think that much of the fear has been instilled, not by the monopolistic operators alone, but by N.R.A. itself. Every assurance should be given to men that they do dare to voice their complaint, that they dare to fight the advantages sought by their monopolistic competitors. Only in that manner can truth be known and remedies ultimately afforded.

Criticism of methods being pursued under N.R.A. is not necessarily criticism of President Roosevelt. Indeed, it is my opinion that the President would be among the first to rally to the cause of fair play when it was intelligently and forcefully established that unfairness was prevailing.

Frederick J. Schlink, technical director of Consumers' Research, Inc., of Washington, and coauthor with Stuart Chase of Your Money's Worth, has prepared proposals for consumer protection under the N.R.A. set-up. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read his recommendations, but I do ask that they may be printed at this point in my remarks. I cannot agree in full with the proposals which Mr. Schlink is making; but, in general, I think he is aiming at an end that must ultimately be accomplished.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PROPOSALS FOR CONSUMER PROTECTION

Frederick J. Schlink, technical director

Consumers Research, Inc., of Washington, N.J., with over 50,000 consumer subscribers, submits the following recommendations for the protection of the 125,000,000 ultimate consumers of the United States:

(1) Open up all N.R.A. records and conferences—past, present, and future.

(2) Open up past and present business, professional connections, and interests of N.R.A. and Ag.A.D. officials and staff and other emergency administrations; all sources of their income, including salaries, retainers, and securities owned or held.

(3) Separation from the service of all N.R.A and A.A.A. officials and employees who are or have recently been employees or officers of corporations or commercial interests affected by or likely to be affected by operations of such public authority, except such advisory boards without executive authority as may be authorized by Congress.

(4) Code authorities to be governmental agencies staffed by appointive and civil-service executives and employees, with all meetings for any proposal whatsoever to be open and their minutes and records public records; the same to apply to the Recovery Administration and the several deputy administrations and other officials connected with the recovery program.

(5) Publication of studies of capitalization prices, profits, volume of sales, and wages for the past 5 years in all industries coming under the codes.

(6) Revocation of all code provisions and trade agreements fixing prices.

(7) Immediate establishment of the consumers standard board, proposed by Prof. Robert E. Lynd, and putting standards of quality in all codes as a basis for securing and clearly defining grades of all commodities.

(8) Setting up branch testing bureaus in the several States to test and evaluate consumers' commodities, and to determine whether they comply with reasonable standards and with the claims made for them, and to publish and otherwise make fully available their advantages.

(9) Immediate establishment of the department of the consumer to orient the work of all Government departments toward the protection and safeguarding of consumer interests.

(10) Cessation of research and testing activities by Government departments for commercial firms and interests and the immediate allocation of a major part of efforts by of existing technical bureaus to projects meeting consumers' needs (under the general direction of the department of the consumer as soon as established).

(11) Opening of files of all Government technical bureaus to all Government officials and qualified representatives of consumer organizations.

(12) Establishment of Government publications, free or at nominal cost, to disseminate information on prices, qualities, and comparative characteristics and values of ultimate consumers' commodities of all sorts.

(13) Each of the radio stations and radio chains be required to assign not less than 1 hour a day to the Government's representatives for the purpose of courses in consumer education with respect to costs, prices, and qualities of consumers' goods.

(14) Establishment of agencies to market foods, textile products, and other essential commodities in competition with private business as a means of setting fair prices.

Mr. NYE. As for my own criticism, and to summarize what I have been trying to say as to the N.R.A. policy, let me say that there should be larger invitation of criticism and less of acts which would throw fear into the hearts of men who believe they have been injured under their code. The codes have been too hastily drawn to insure against unfair advantage being taken by monopolists. There seems to have been more interest in how many codes per minute could be turned out than in what was in those codes. Unfortunate selections have been made in choosing the men to supervise the code drafting. The background of these men has too often been that of big-business association. One N.R.A. authority has declared that business and the Government were partners under N.R.A. This leads to the thought that in too many instances the Government has been the silent partner.

Further fair criticism, it seems to me, is the finding that upon code authorities in most industries sit the very forces which brought ruin upon us through their very violent business practices of late years. Big business never did see beyond its own nose, and their representative are not the kind who can intelligently lead us out of the wreck they invited. Profit seems to be the great watchword under N.R.A. If that continues, then the N.R.A. builds upon dangerous sands, such as the fictitious capitalizations which are a part of big business. If in a primary way investment profit continues to be the measuring stick of prosperity and the god of our worship is to continue to be investment profit, we might better save our time and money and let greed move to its ultimate end in its own way.

There has been, under N.R.A., too complete a departure from Federal Trade Commission voice in these code issues. As now constituted, that Commission invites confidence and should be used more extensively. A reversal of policy at the N.R.A., the adoption of a policy that would, if need be, find the Government blind to the demands of the plunderbund in the business world will open the door to real progress for America under the recovery program. If what seems to have been the policy of N.R.A. is continued, the plunderers may well adopt The Last Round-up as their theme song and trample under heel whatever remains of independent business and make the consumer a mere slave to their interests.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the thorough discussion of the effect of combines, trusts, and monopolies upon the efforts of the N.R.A., upon the part of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], will enable me to be brief in my remarks.

When the Industrial Recovery Act came over from the House of Representatives, during the last session, it provided for the suspension of the antitrust laws, including what is known as the Sherman antitrust law, the Clayton Act, and, in a large measure, the Federal Trade Commission Act. When it came to be considered in the Senate I offered an amendment which would have had the effect of restoring the antitrust laws. That amendment was adopted by the Senate. It went to conference and was stricken out, and a generalization with reference to monopoly and monopolistic practices was inserted in its place. The industrial measure became a law with a provision suspending the antitrust laws.

I am of the opinion that the amendment was stricken out under what I think was a misapprehension that the antitrust laws would conflict with the National Recovery Act and its successful execution. I shall undertake, either today or later, to show that there need be and would be, under any fair interpretation, no conflict between the purposes and principles and execution of the National Recovery Act and the enforcement of the antitrust laws. Indeed, the antitrust laws would support and strengthen the industrial act if we are to assume it was to be executed in accordance with the high purposes which accompanied its enactment.

I have introduced a measure to repeal that portion of the National Recovery Act which suspends the antitrust laws. I do so for the reason that I do not believe that there is any conflict between the two sets of laws, the Industrial Recovery Act and the antitrust laws, and for the further reason that I am convinced that it will be impossible to protect the consumers of this country and small business unless we have the antitrust laws restored and enforced. I trust the committee will speedily report this measure and that it may soon become a law.

The able Senator from North Dakota has called attention to numerous instances in which monopolies, combines, and trusts have, either in what they claim is in accordance with the codes, or in defiance of the codes, put up prices to an exorbitant point, and driven small business out of the field. It is supposed upon the part of some that by revising these codes, and by a more particular consideration of the effect of monopolies, the consumer and the small business man can be protected. I do not think so. I do not believe it is possible to protect them so long as we permit these combinations in restraint of trade, so long as we permit the great combines to fix prices, and do those things the fruits of which we are gathering at the present time. On the other hand, it seems to me that if the antitrust laws were restored, working in conjunction with the Industrial Recovery Act, we could establish fair competition, could protect labor, and, at the same time, could protect the consumer and the small business man.

We are now upon the verge of considering the question of the devaluation of our gold dollar, but the question arises, What will be the effect of that upon small business, or upon the consumer, if the combines and the trusts are able to get together, sit about a table, and fix the prices which shall be paid for their products, and to establish rules and practices which shall drive small business out of the field? If the masses are to get the benefit which is contemplated by the monetary legislation in hand, they must necessarily be protected against the power of monopolies, of combines, and of trusts to fix the prices of products and to establish the rules of the game, and, in my opinion, it will not be possible to do that so long as the antitrust laws are suspended. A cheap dollar will be a bad visitor to the laborer who sees the cost of living controlled by trusts. And higher prices for farm commodities will bring little relief if some power is abroad which can raise the price of everything the farmer buys. It is impractical, impossible, to accomplish it through the codes.

Secondly, it will be proposed shortly that we appropriate another very large sum of money for public works. Who will get the money? If the prices which the laborer must pay for the things he must have in order to live are constantly increased, as they have been increased for the past several months, the increased amount to be expended in the building of public works will be of very little benefit to the laborers of the country. So this question of protecting prices, protecting consumers against exorbitant prices, and protecting the small business man against rules and practices which drive him out of business touches for weal or woe every enterprise which we are proposing in this Congress for the purpose of bettering the condition of the country. There is no enterprise which is proposed or can be proposed which will work successfully in the interest of the masses or will work successfully in the restoration of the purchasing power of the masses if there be behind it all a supreme and superior power which can fix the prices of products and fix the rules of business, compelling the small business man to leave the field. If we are to leave unrestrained and uncontrolled the power of combines to fix prices, we shall legislate in vain to restore contentment and prosperity among the great body of the people. The power to fix prices is the power to levy tribute which economically enslaves.

I think that if the Congress will take the time, in the midst of the crowded business affairs which are coming, to familiarize itself with the effect of these combines and trusts and monopolies under these codes we will restore the antitrust laws and seek to enforce them. If we do so, we shall tax the people and appropriate money to some good purpose.

Let me call attention, as an illustration which will help to illuminate what I have to present. A writer in the New York Times upon the steel code has had this to say:

> But the present—and large—fact is that steel likes its code. It greatly likes the privilege, which the code grants, of gathering around a table for common action on the common problems of the industry.

When they gather around the table, which they are permitted to do, and which they are greatly gratified that they may do, they determine the question of prices, and they not only determine the question of prices, but they determine rules and practices which affect every small man in the business. They go further, and provide at this round table, as I shall show in a moment, the method and manner in which they shall make bids and distribute the bids among themselves. This table is not purely a social gathering, it is a business gathering and the history of combines leaves nothing to the imagination as to what takes place. The people pay for that gathering.

> The right is given to the steel industry to confer, as one steel man said, without danger of going to jail.

Mr. President, there never was any danger of anyone going to jail from the mere act of conference. That is a mistaken idea of the antitrust law. It might have been so in the beginning, with reference to the antitrust law; but out of 30 years of emasculation by the decisions of the Supreme Court, there is no danger, and never has been of recent years, in the mere act of conference, if that conference does not have for its purpose the destroying of competition, the destroying of small business, and the control of prices beyond what is reasonable and just. The Supreme Court has charted a safe course for business if it desires to treat the public and competitors with decency and fairness.

> The right is given to the steel industry to confer—as one steel man said, "without danger of going to jail"—concerning the harmful practices about which there could be no common understanding and agreement before the code brought the steel interests together in lawful conclave. Said that steel man: "We don't have to go behind the barn anymore to smoke the cigaret. We have found that the code does for steel what steel has wanted to have done for it since the start of the century."
> The code, briefly, requires each member to report to the code authority his prices on all his products for his basing point—Pittsburgh, say, or Birmingham, or Chicago—at least 10 days before the prices are to go into effect. These base prices are then published and are open to the inspection of all members. No member may sell below the minimum published prices for his own basing point, nor below the lowest price filed by any other member for another basing point. The penalties, fixed by the members themselves, are heavy for violations of the price rules.

Last summer, or early autumn, the Coordinator of Railroads, desiring to purchase steel upon a rather extended basis, called for bids, and he discovered that those gentlemen sitting about the table, about which they may now sit without being in danger, had evidently agreed upon the price, because the price which came in from each and all was identical to the color of a cent. Their minds had met; they thought just alike; they figured just alike. They had been enjoying the holiday of antitrust laws, and had found in that holiday season complete harmony. Cutthroat competition had disappeared; there was one price from all, and that was a sufficient price. And the Government, which had granted the holiday, was to pay the price, and the taxpayers were to stand behind the Government.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, did not my able friend mean to say steel rails?

Mr. BORAH. I said "steel products."

Mr. LEWIS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I wish to remind the Senator that it was rails which he has correctly described and which was the subject of just such an experience as he has described.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. I understood that steel rails were steel products.

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator observed that they were steel products. I was further defining the product of steel.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator may be putting a different definition on steel. I was referring to s-t-e-e-l. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. And both words apply, however.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator.

The Coordinator of Railroads, discovering this coincidence with reference to prices, carried the matter to the President of the United States, and according to the newsprint and according to other evidence the President called in the bidders, and he ascertained that the bid was put in as the result of a complete agreement between the different steel industries.

In that particular instance, Mr. President, the facts concerning the bids were exposed and other bids were called for. This discloses how persistent the monopolistic practices or the practices of combines are to carry out the original purposes with reference to trusts, even after the codes have been adopted.

I have learned lately that the method by which these same interests make bids upon work offered by the Government is that they present precisely the same bid; and then when the work is allotted upon the basis of a certain price, they put their names in small tubes, throw them all into a box, and draw out one, and assign the contracts to the one, whoever it may be, whose name is drawn out. One can hardly withhold sharing the pleasure which these fine business men derive from the fact that they may now "meet around a table without danger."

So the Government of the United States, Mr. President, under the code can have only one bidder for all the products in the steel line which the Government may desire to secure. It is as complete a price fixing, as complete a monopoly with reference to that class of practices, as has prevailed at any time in the history of trusts in the United States.

I do not believe that it is possible, as a practical proposition, to forestall such price fixing by the writing of the terms of the code. I think we must restore the law which administers punishment in case this class of practices is indulged in.

A few days ago General Johnson was quoted in the newspapers upon this subject. I read the following from a newspaper article:

> Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, directing a sharp and sometimes angry attack on alleged monopolistic practices under the N.R.A., said: "You are simply trying to set up arbitrary price fixing on products of an individual manufacturer by a jury of his own competitors."

That, Mr. President, states the whole thing in a single sentence. That is what is constantly happening. And while price fixing has been detected and sought to be remedied in perhaps half a dozen instances, there are hundreds of instances where it is being carried on without any detection or without at least any correction.

Mr. Neagle said that the industry would fix reasonable prices. Said General Johnson:

> Many industries have promised that, but few have done it.

Indeed, the supposition in the beginning was that if industry were permitted to fix prices in times of depression like this, when the whole country was under the strain of recovery, that they would fix fair prices, that they would, under the injunction and domination of the Government, fix only fair prices. And, as General Johnson said, many have promised to do so, but we find from actual practice, as cited in numerous instances by the Senator from North Dakota, they have not done so. Their practices are the same as they were before the Sherman antitrust law was suspended.

It is my contention that at the present time millions of dollars are being extorted from the pockets of the masses, from the common people of this country, in prices which are fixed by combines and trusts and monopolies, notwithstanding the provisions of the code. I will cite a few illustrations which will disclose that I am well within the terms of modesty when I say that millions are being extorted from the people of this country. I do not believe, as has been suggested somewhere, that this extortion takes place by connivance of the code, or in accordance with the terms of the code. I believe this extortion takes place in defiance of the spirit of the code, and in defiance of the terms of the code. We will never be able to bring about a different condition until we have a greater and stronger power back of the code; that is, the power to punish for the doing of such things.

I believe furthermore, Mr. President, that under the rules which are established by these codes, in a large measure by the big interests, the rules are such as to drive out of business, or drive from the field, thousands and thousands of small business men. Since last October, when I made some remarks upon this subject, which were published, I have received a little over 9,000 letters from small business men of the country, giving instances of how the code was either embarrassing them or driving them out of business. And there, again, I say that I see no possible way to protect the small business man unless the antitrust laws are restored. It might be possible—I do not know, it does not seem to me practical or possible—to make a code for small business men, as you might call them, or business of certain dimensions in business, or a certain extent of business, and a code for the larger business. That does not seem to me to be practical. I see no other way by which we can approach the question except that we restore the antitrust laws and enforce them. The small business men cannot fight successfully these combines if the Government is to step aside and place no restraint upon their economic power. Small business is entitled to the enforcement of the laws of the land, designed and passed with the view of protecting society against these rapacious economic forces.

Nowhere has the power to fix prices, and its effect, been better illustrated than with reference to the agricultural interests of the country. A vast amount, Mr. President, has been expended for the purpose of restoring agriculture, of bringing back the price of commodities upon the farm. Not only have vast sums been expended but most extraordinary measures have been adopted. Acreage has been reduced, livestock has been destroyed, in the hope of restoring the price of commodities to the American farmer. There has been some increase to the advantage of the American farmer, particularly in some commodities, but I make the assertion here today, without fear of successful contradiction, that when we take into consideration the price—the increased price you may call it—which the farmer is receiving for his commodity and the increased and extraordinary price which he is paying for the things which he must use, he is no better off than he was before the price raise took place. He is paying for the things which he must have in excess of the price which he receives.

There again, Mr. President, this inhibition of combines for the purpose of fixing prices, which was stricken out when the bill passed through the Congress, tells the tale of why it is that notwithstanding some advantage has come to the farmer, he is in fact no better off than he was.

The price of everything, from overalls to gasoline, has gone up all the way from 67 to 120 percent; and so long as present conditions exist, so long as men engaged in industry have the power to sit about a table and fix prices, they will continue to raise their prices in order to keep a little ahead of the rise in the prices of commodities. If the price of the farmer's product advances, those who sell to the farmers may overnight increase the price of that which they have to sell to them; and combines, trusts, and monopolies, operating under the wings of the eagle, effectuate their purposes more successfully than they could if they did not have the apparent protection of the Government.

A statement issued by the National Grange a few days ago has this to say:

> While it is the declared policy of Congress, as set forth in the Agricultural Adjustment Act, to reestablish and maintain the same price parity between agricultural and industrial commodities which obtained in the pre-war period, the latest index of the Department of Agriculture, issued on December 29, shows that the average level of farm prices now is only 68 percent of the pre-war level. Prices paid by farmers for commodities bought stand at 118. This makes a spread of 50 points to the disadvantage of agriculture.

There is scarcely an article which the farmer buys that is not under the control of some combination, some trust, or monopoly. There may be cited, for instance, the extraordinary rise in the price of farm implements, of gasoline, and other things which the farmer must buy to use upon the farm, all of which are controlled, either directly or indirectly, by combines which may operate in spite of the codes so long as the antitrust law is suspended. Mr. Peek a few days ago said:

> The Department of Agriculture estimates that gross farm income this year will be $6,360,000,000, exceeding that of last year by more than $1,200,000,000; but this is not clear gain, since already about one third of the increase is offset by higher prices on the things the farmers buy.

I have made some calculations and have had others made. I think Mr. Peek is very generous in his statement with reference to the increase in farm income being offset only to the extent of one third. I venture the opinion that the entire increase of $1,200,000,000 has been gathered up and has gone into the pockets and the coffers of those whose prices were already sufficiently high.

The United States News, quoting from the agricultural reports, shows as follows:

> Cotton towels have risen 87 percent; ladies' hosiery, 63 percent; children's hosiery, 94 percent; men's socks, 67 percent; ribbed union suits, 73 percent; cheap shirts, over 72 percent; overalls, over 100 percent.

Mr. President, regardless of the extent to which acreage may be curtailed, and regardless of the destruction of animals upon the farm, there is no possibility of the farmer's meeting his taxes, meeting his interest, or meeting his mortgage if the price of the things which he must buy continues to rise in that proportion.

I ask by what or whose authority were these prices increased? Will it be contended that the codes authorized the increase? Will it be contended that the National Industrial Recovery Act connives at that increase? In my opinion, the increase arises out of the fact that we took the reins off when we passed this law and permitted the combines and trusts to have their own way with reference to fixing prices. We have got to do one of two things: If we are going to protect the consumers of this country, we must either restore the antitrust laws and enforce them, or the Government must go all the way and itself fix prices. There is no other way of which I can conceive by which to protect the consumer.

It does not serve any good purpose to restore purchasing power to a few million; it must be restored to the great body of the people, the millions who do the purchasing, in order to give life and stimulus and vitality to industry.

I have a letter here from a western farmer, a paragraph or two of which I shall read. It was written on January 1, 1934, and, in part, reads as follows:

> During the last 2 weeks live hogs were $3 per hundred; butterfat was 10 cents per pound; eggs were 8 cents per dozen; potatoes, 60 cents per hundred pounds for no. 1; onions, about 40 cents per hundred; corn, now 55 to 60 cents per hundred; wheat, about 80 to 85 cents per hundred; oats and barley, 60 cents per hundred; hay, $6 to $7 per ton; turkeys, as low as 8 cents per pound; chickens, down to 7 cents per pound.
> Overalls, on the other hand, have practically doubled in price; print goods the same; cotton goods of all kinds the same; flour almost 100 percent advance; machinery repairs remain constant, as they were during the war; new machinery always has remained at about the war price level; harness remains at very nearly the war price; gasoline and fuel oil, 10 to 20 percent advance; potato bags, 2 to 3 cents advance.
> While this has been going on, a gentleman in a nearby city has obtained a portion of a Government contract on some meat—I think 200,000 pounds—at 14 cents per pound. He is paying $3 per hundred for hogs with which to fill the contract. I dare say he will realize a net profit of from $10 to $12 per head on enough hogs with which to fill this contract. Other packers, such as Swift, Armour, Cudahy, etc., are doing the same thing.

It will be recalled that last summer, when the packers found that the consumers would not consume on account of the increased price caused by the processing tax, they simply lowered the price which they would pay for the purchase of hogs.

I have a number of letters here, Mr. President, from working people. I shall read only one.

> My husband has had some increase in his wages, but the higher prices for the things which we must have takes away more than the increase in wages he gets. Our clothing, shoes, and everything which we have to buy to live on make us about 10 percent worse off than before. We have three children, and the higher prices count when it comes to taking care of a family. Some of the prices seem to us really "hold-ups."
> At a gathering of a number of wives of working men last week we went over the matter of prices. We talked it all over and made estimates as to the increased cost of living. We all agreed that it more than took away the increase in our wages, and where there was no increase in wages it took some from the old wage. We hope the President will get hold of these people who are racketeering on us poor people.

Mr. President, how can the President of the United States get hold of them? How can the country get hold of them? I ask the Senate to consider seriously the question, Is there any way to reach the problem except through the force of law? I ask also, Are we going to sit still and do nothing? Are we, by our silence and inaction, going to connive in this merciless extortion?

Contemplate, Mr. President, the millions which are being collected from the working people of the country and from the farmers of the country by reason of these increased prices. Contemplate what it means to these people to be deprived of all possibility to save, to lift the mortgage on the home, and to provide an education for their children. Are we interested in the people who sent us here? If so, let us deaden the hold of these combines upon their homes and families.

It is said that the increase in wages made necessary the increase in prices. Perhaps about 10 percent of the increase in prices might properly be accounted for by the increase in wages and other expenses. The President called attention to that fact in one of his public addresses. A very small portion of the increase in prices is necessary in order to take care of any increase imposed upon industry by reason of the National Industrial Recovery Act and increased wages; but they took advantage of the situation and increased their prices to the points which I have indicated.

Mr. President, I intend at a later day to discuss the question of the small business man, which, to my mind, is even a more serious problem, in a sense, than that affecting the consumer, because the small business man is really being driven out of existence. When he goes, there will be no hope for the consumer.

As I said a while ago, I have some 9,000 letters from small business men in this country, but I shall discuss this matter on a later date; but just so certain as the National Industrial Recovery Act continues to be executed as it is now being executed, with the antitrust laws suspended, with the influence and power which the large combines must necessarily have in fixing codes, the small business men must pass out of the field of industry. That is recognized by General Johnson, it would seem, since he is beginning to make efforts to try to protect them. He may believe, and he undoubtedly does, that it can be done through administration. I do not think it is possible to accomplish it through administration. We can only accomplish it by restoring and enforcing the law.

When the National Industrial Recovery Act was passed, it was contended by the able Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and others that if we left the antitrust laws in effect it would inhibit the doing of certain things which it was contemplated were necessary to be done under the National Industrial Recovery Act. I have examined, as carefully as I could and with as much ability as I could bring to the subject, all the decisions of the Supreme Court in construing the antitrust laws. I have compared those decisions with the objects and purposes of the National Industrial Recovery Act and those things which the National Industrial Recovery Act has been promoting through its codes, and I undertake to say that there can be no legitimate conflict between the enforcement of the antitrust laws and the carrying on of the National Industrial Recovery Act according to its terms.

The National Industrial Recovery Act had for its purpose that of restoring fair competition, to enable business to come together, it was said, and adopt rules and practices which would establish fair competition. Now, I ask, Where is the decision of the Supreme Court, where is the principle announced by that Court in recent years, which prohibits business from sitting down together and agreeing upon a rule which results in fair competition, whether it is labor or whatever it may be? If they go no further, says the Supreme Court, than to establish fair competition, they are not within the inhibitions of the antitrust laws. We do not want, under the guise of a code or under the guise of the National Industrial Recovery Act, to establish unfair competition, and yet, as we are proceeding under the National Industrial Recovery Act, that is precisely what is taking place. Unfair competition is now driving out of existence hundreds of thousands of small business men and doing it more effectively than was ever done before the enactment of the Sherman Antitrust Law.

Justice Brandeis in a decision said:

> The legality of an agreement [to a combine] or regulation cannot be determined by so simple a test as to whether it restrains competition. Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains. To bind, to restrain, is of their very essence. The true test of legality is whether the restraint imposed is such as merely regulates and perhaps thereby promotes competition, or whether it is such as may suppress or even destroy competition. (Board of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S.)

In executing the National Industrial Recovery Act the effort is that of establishing fair competition. But the combines and the trusts, with the antitrust law repealed, take advantage of the situation and under it establish unfair competition—destructive competition. That is not to be protected by the National Industrial Recovery Act, and it is prohibited by the antitrust laws.

Again the Supreme Court said, in Nash v. United States (229 U.S.):

> These cases (the Standard Oil and tobacco cases) may be taken to have established that only such contracts and combinations are within the act as by reason of intent or the inherent nature of contemplated acts prejudice the public interest by unduly restricting competition or unduly obstructing the course of trade.

I have before me the last pronouncement of the Supreme Court on the antitrust laws in the Appalachian Coal case (288 U.S. 344). If one who wants to do business in this country on a fair basis, upon a basis of fair competition, with justice to the competitor, he comes well within the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in that case. The opinion was written by Justice Hughes, in which he said:

> Competing producers of bituminous coal formed a corporation to act as their selling agent, with authority to set the prices. The industry was in grave distress because of overexpansion, relatively diminishing consumption, organized buying, and injurious marketing practices within itself; and the members of the combination sought, through the agent, to escape those practices, promote the sale of their coal in fair competition, and sell as much of it as possible. Although they controlled a large proportion—73 percent—of the commercial production in the immediate region where they mined, the great bulk of their output was marketed in another and highly competitive region; and in view of the vast volume of other coal actually and potentially available, the conditions of production, and transportation facilities, there was no basis for concluding that competition anywhere could be injuriously affected by the operation of their plan. Held that there is no present reason for an injunction under the Sherman Act.

In the body of the opinion the Court said:

> There is no question as to the test to be applied in determining the legality of the defendants' conduct. The purpose of the Sherman Antitrust Act is to prevent undue restraints of interstate commerce, to maintain its appropriate freedom in the public interest, to afford protection from the subversive or coercive influences of monopolistic endeavor. As a charter of freedom, the act has a generality and adaptability comparable to that found to be desirable in constitutional provisions. It does not go into detailed definitions which might either work injury to legitimate enterprise or through particularization defeat its purposes by providing loopholes for escape. The restrictions the act imposes are not mechanical or artificial. Its general phrases, interpreted to attain its fundamental objects, set up the essential standard of reasonableness. They call for vigilance in the detection and frustration of all efforts unduly to restrain the free course of interstate commerce, but they do not seek to establish a mere delusive liberty either by making impossible the normal and fair expansion of that commerce or the adoption of reasonable measures to protect it from injurious and destructive practices and to promote competition upon a sound basis. "The decisions establish", said this Court in Nash v. United States (229 U.S. 373, 376), "that only such contracts and combinations are within the act as, by reason of intent or the inherent nature of the contemplated acts, prejudice the public interests by unduly restricting competition or unduly obstructing the course of trade."
> In applying this test, a close and objective scrutiny of particular conditions and purposes is necessary in each case. Realities must dominate the judgment. The mere fact that the parties to an agreement eliminate competition between themselves is not enough to condemn it. "The legality of an agreement or regulation cannot be determined by so simple a test, as whether it restrains competition. Every agreement concerning trade, every regulation of trade, restrains" (Chicago Board of Trade v. United States, supra). The familiar illustrations of partnerships, and enterprises fairly integrated in the interest of the promotion of commerce, at once occur. The question of the application of the statute is one of intent and effect, and is not to be determined by arbitrary assumptions. It is therefore necessary in this instance to consider the economic conditions peculiar to the coal industry, the practices which have obtained, the nature of defendant's plan of making sales, the reasons which led to its adoption, and the probable consequences of the carrying out of that plan in relation to market prices and other matters affecting the public interest in interstate commerce in bituminous coal.

What is undertaken to be done under the National Industrial Recovery Act? Taking into consideration the economic conditions which now confront us, the necessity of having fair competition as the result of an agreement between the business interests of the country, we are undertaking the establishment of a better wage, thereby increasing the purchasing power of the laborers of the country. These are the things which, generally speaking, the National Recovery Administration have in mind. How do they propose to do it? By cutting out unfair competition. Why not call upon the Antitrust Act? By cutting our destructive competition. Why not call upon the antitrust law? What is there that they seek to eliminate that is not prohibited by the antitrust law?

So I contend that the antitrust law will serve as a support, as a help for the proper execution of the National Industrial Recovery Act. Unless we have some protection of that kind, how are we going to protect the people against the fixing of prices and the destruction of small business in the country?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I should like to have the Senator's definition of fair competition, particularly as it relates to the small industries of the country. Would the Senator say that a small, struggling industry in a thinly populated section of the country could be required to pay the same wage that is paid by a very much more prosperous industry of the same type in a thickly populated section of the country?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not think that would be fair competition. I think in order to establish fair competition there must be taken into consideration the competition which is being established between industries engaged in like enterprises under practically like conditions.

Mr. GLASS. It is the theory of those who administer the National Industrial Recovery Act that the struggling industries to which I have referred should be driven out of business because of the fact that they cannot pay the wages provided in the codes for the more prosperous industries. In fact, I in person took to the administrative authority a letter from a canning factory in my State in which it was detailed that the factory's business had been so poor in the previous year that they had lost $17,000, and that to comply with the code for that particular industry would simply drive them out of business altogether, and leave altogether idle the people whom they had been accustomed to employ. The response I got was that they were unfortunate, but they would have to go out of business in order to maintain the standard of wages prescribed by the code for that particular industry.

To show that that is true, on yesterday I received a letter from Florida enclosing me a clipping from, as I recall, one of the Miami papers, in which it was stated that the canning industry in that particular section of the State needed the services of from 1,200 to 1,400 persons to pick fruit which was to be canned, but they had been unable to employ anybody because the persons whom they had been accustomed to employ were on the relief rolls of the country and refused to render service except at 45 cents an hour, which would wreck the industry.

I have in my files a letter from what once was one of the most prosperous cotton mills in Virginia. If the Senator will bear with me for a minute longer——

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. GLASS. As I remember the circumstances, it was perhaps the most prosperous cotton mill in Virginia next to the Dan River Mills, which are the largest in the world, I think. This letter told me that they were being driven out of business—the mill being located at Martinsburg, Va.—because they found it utterly impossible to pay the wages or to increase the employment required by the code for that industry, and that they would just simply have to shut up shop.

I have a letter, which I sent directly to the administrative authorities, from a modest garment-manufacturing establishment in my State, citing the same condition; and I have, in response, the astonishing statement that that industry would have to go out of business, because if continuing in business in the circumstances it would impinge upon the standard of wages provided by the code for that industry.

So I can readily believe, as I readily anticipated, the statement of the Senator from Idaho that thousands upon thousands of struggling industries are being driven out of business.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it may be that there are those connected with the administration of the National Recovery Act who entertain the theory that the small business man must go; but I do not believe that the President of the United States entertains that view. I have reason to believe that he does not; and I think that at last, when the facts are fully presented, the President will decide the policy. I think any man who says that small business has to go is—well, I will yield to the Senator from Colorado, because I am unable to command any parliamentary language with which to express myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The distinguished Senator from Idaho, I believe, has not discussed one aspect of the present problem which has awakened my concern.

About 2 years ago, as I recall his testimony, Mr. Swope, of the General Electric Co., testifying at hearings on economic planning, stated, in substance, that if the Sherman and other antitrust acts were suspended, without restrictions being placed on profits, the trade associations of the United States should be willing to guarantee adequate minimum wages, old-age pensions, and other social benefits to their employees. I am disposed to conclude—and I assume that the Senator from Idaho concurs—that at the last session we unhappily surrendered the protection of those laws without an adequate quid pro quo. May I ask the Senator from Idaho whether he knows any compensating benefits for the public which would justify us in permanently surrendering the safeguards of the antitrust acts?

Mr. BORAH. I know of none, Mr. President. I do not think there can be any compensation for unjust prices charged to the public. I do not think there can be any compensation for the destruction of small business. I think the most difficult—certainly one of the most important—economic problems we have is that of protecting the consumers of the country against exorbitant prices charged by those who through combination have gotten possession of our national resources, who have the power to fix prices, and who may collect in accordance with their desire an almost unlimited toll unless the Government steps in and intervenes between them and those against whom they are assessing the toll.

I do not know that the antitrust law is a complete remedy for that condition. I do not undertake to say that it is; but I say that it is an important, indispensable factor in it, and that it is one of the factors which we ought not to surrender. I believe if the two parties were as anxious to enforce the antitrust laws after the election as they were before, and if that policy had been followed up for the last 20 years according to pledges, the American people would have been protected to a very marked degree against the exorbitant prices which they have been paying through all these years.

Some people were surprised that when this depression came it fell with such tremendous effect upon the masses of the people almost overnight. It seemed that thousands and millions of people almost overnight were asking for help. Why was it? Seventy-five million out of 120,000,000 people, even in the days of prosperity, were enjoying an income of a little over $500 a year, and out of that $500 a year they were paying rent, undertaking to take care of children, and to educate them and still paying these prices—a process which was gathering millions and millions of dollars into the coffers of the combines of this country.

People may talk about communism, and the propaganda from here and from there, with reference to a change of our form of government; but that which is driving us today to a threatened change in our form of government is the control of those who have the power to assess prices against the people of the United States. Instead of destroying or controlling these combines, we seem to be going into partnership with them, which means the end of a republican form of government.

I venture to say, Mr. President, that unless we go back to the antitrust laws, and utilize all the power we have to enforce them, the concentration of wealth will continue in the next 20 years at a greater ratio than it has in the last 20 years.

One of the purposes of the National Recovery Act, as we were told, and doubtless as those who fathered it believed, was to work a more equitable distribution of the wealth of the country—certainly a desirable thing to do, and certainly I would support any proposition which would work a more equitable distribution of the wealth of the country. But if the combines of this country are permitted to continue to collect the prices which they see fit to fix, and if they are permitted to drive the small business man out of business, it will not be long before the concentration of wealth which hitherto has prevailed will not be a circumstance to that which will prevail. As the thing is now being worked, it is a perfect machine for transferring the small holdings of the many to the possession of the few.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that not only are the great industries pleased with the provision of the act which suspends the antitrust laws, but they are pleased with other things——

Mr. BORAH. Yes; they are happy.

Mr. GLASS. One of which seems to have converted that big-hearted, generous patriot, the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad. They are pleased with the fact that the railroads are borrowing hundreds of millions of dollars themselves, and the Steel Corporation likewise, selling them rails.

Mr. BORAH. There is something to be said in favor of anything which could make the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad smile. He always seemed so unhappy.

Mr. GLASS. What is to be gained by making one man smile and making a thousand others grum?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to pursue the matter further at this time. I give notice, however, that at a later date I shall discuss the particular phase of the subject which deals with the destruction of small business in the United States.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the Senate, in executive session, took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, January 19, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, holy, holy is Thy name. Whenever man oppresses man, whenever any institution renders injustice, O God of the most liberal sky, be there; Thine arm make bare and Thy righteous will be done. We rejoice that Thy boundless mercy is the joy of heaven and the wonder of earth. Touch all hearts with the Golden Rule, which is superior to the teaching of the gods and to men. We trust that we shall never swerve from the chief purpose to bring comfort to the hearts and homes of the poor. We pray that our Government throughout all its future years may be the guardian of the unfortunate and the oppressed. In the depths of our illuminated and penitent souls do Thou combine in us radiant knowledge, the transforming spirit of Thy word, and all that is ennobling in eternal hope and honor and glory be unto Thee forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia; that the Senate insists upon its amendments to said bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. REYNOLDS, Mr. KING, and Mr. CAPPER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the newly elected Representative from the State of Vermont, Mr. PLUMLEY, is here this morning and would like to take the oath of office.

I may say for the information of the Speaker and the House that I have had telegrams from the Governor and the secretary of state of the State of Vermont which informed me that Mr. PLUMLEY was elected by about 8,000 majority and that there is no contest contemplated, and that there are no irregularities in any way in connection with the election. As Vermont is without representation here at the present time, I respectfully request, if there is no objection, that he receive the oath of office at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what assurance has the gentleman from New York from reliable Democratic authorities in the State of Vermont that there is no contest?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has received a telegram of congratulations from his opponent. I suppose that is the best authority there is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY appeared in the well of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

PERMISSION TO THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask permission of the House that this committee may sit during the sessions of the House today and tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

REREFERENCE OF THE BILL H.R. 6486

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 6486, to repeal certain provisions of the act of March 4, 1933, and to reenact sections 4 and 5 of the act of March 2, 1929, be rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill is now referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws; but because of circumstances too long to explain, which, however, have been explained to the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, the rereference meeting with his approval, I ask that it be rereferred to this committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

ALCOHOLIC-BEVERAGE REGULATION IN THE DISTRICT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Mrs. NORTON, Mr. PALMISANO, and Mr. STALKER.

REFERENCE OF THE GOLD STANDARD BILL

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is whether the Steagall bill and the message of the President be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and ordered to be printed, or be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The President in his message stated:

> Although under existing law there is authority, by Executive act, to take title to the gold in the possession or control of the Reserve banks, this is a step of such importance that I prefer to ask the Congress by specific enactment to vest in the United States Government title to all supplies of American-owned monetary gold, with provision for the payment therefor in gold certificates. These gold certificates will be, as now, secured at all times dollar for dollar by gold in the Treasury—gold for each dollar of such weight and fineness as may be established from time to time.

Under section 8, paragraph 5, it is provided:

> The Congress shall have the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

Section 311 of the United States Code (sec. 28, Stat. 4), November 1, 1893, it is provided:

Policy of United States as to bimetallism: It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts; and it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in payment of debts.

What is the fundamental distinction here? This distinction is not only fundamental but it is as clear as crystal. There would seem to be no opportunity here to confuse the Congress as the public has been confused on this fundamental distinction.

The Committee on Banking and Currency has to do with note issue of banking and note issue of the Treasury that are promises to pay. The Coinage Committee has to do with that thing which is paid. The Coinage Committee has to do with the value of the fundamental money which is promised to be paid. The Banking and Currency Committee has to do with the structure of credit superimposed upon this basis. It is clear that the measure before the House proposes to deal with the money of the Nation. It has nothing to do with promises to pay. It has only to do with the thing which is to be paid. If this bill and message is not for the Coinage Committee what powers has it got? The Coinage Committee is the committee of standards. There is no other committee in Congress that deals with standards; there is no committee in the Senate that deals with standards. The House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is the committee that has the jurisdiction principally set aside for maintaining standards and I wish to point out that the most important standard which this Nation can guard is the standard of measure of value, which is the money unit as relates to its value. The standard of measure of distance must contain distance; the standard of measure of volume must contain volume; the standard measure of weight must contain weight; and the standard measure of value must contain value. We are dealing here, Mr. Speaker, with the standard or unit of measure of value. For the last 60 years Congress has neglected to exercise its jurisdiction by delegating this power to banking. We are now all of us alive to the fact that banking has selfish interests as well as the general interest in this matter of standards. We can now see clearly that one of the most momentous mistakes of government in this country has been the neglect of Congress to control the standard of value.

The brief prepared by Mr. SOMERS, the chairman of the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee, in conjunction with Mr. DIES, is able and convincing proof that this bill and the message should be handled by the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee, otherwise there is no reason for the existence of this committee.

Rule 11 of the House of Representatives, powers and duties of committees, reads:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule as follows, viz, subjects reading:

6. To coinage, weights, and measures—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

NOTE.—This committee was established in 1864 (IV 4090). It has reported on bills defining and fixing the standard of value, regulating coinage and exchanges of coin (IV 4095), coinage of silver and purchase of bullion (IV 4093), Hawaiian coinage (IV 4092) * * *. (Rules of the House of Representatives, p. 311.)

It is submitted that as a matter of law, as a matter of precedent, and as a matter of right this bill and message must be referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, the Assistant Secretary of War, former Gov. Harry H. Woodring, delivered a very illuminating address on the state of the national defense before the National Sojourners' Club at the Mayflower Hotel last Saturday evening. I ask unanimous consent to insert a copy of this speech in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

I consider it not only a great pleasure but also a special privilege to participate with the National Sojourners this evening in their annual banquet. I appreciate the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co. in bringing this meeting into the homes of the members of this patriotic organization and to the great body of American citizens throughout the Nation.

It is the primary purpose of the National Sojourners to support all patriotic aims and activities in Masonry, to develop true patriotism and Americanism throughout the Nation, and to oppose any influence whatsoever calculated to weaken the national security.

Not only those gathered here tonight but patriotic citizens everywhere have grave responsibilities in fostering a universal realization of the duties and responsibilities which are obligations of good citizenship—the obligation to defend as well as to receive the rights guaranteed to the American people by our Constitution.

There are many in the country today who have wandered away from the ideals and the principles upon which this Nation was founded, and it becomes increasingly important that we of true American faith do everything in our power to provide a national stability and a security which will insure the ultimate triumph of those national ideals of social justice, economic well-being, and political equality.

We hear continuously the demand to outlaw war, but no nation has as yet devised a practical solution acceptable to all nations. It has been proposed that America take the initial action and completely disarm as a step toward perpetual peace. America disarmed would not guarantee peace. We might as well disband the fire departments to prevent fires, or the police departments to prevent crimes. Human nature must change before we can rely upon such a measure to insure peace and good will throughout the world. Each nation still has its national aspirations and its own aims; each people its own language and its own way of thinking; and misunderstandings among nations still grow into hatreds by which wars are engendered.

This Nation became a nation as a result of war and has been maintained only through the sacrifice of its loyal and patriotic citizens in many wars. It has grown and prospered while bestowing the benefits of free and representative government on its people only because of the willingness of its manhood to lay down their lives in its defense. No pacifist doctrine ever created a nation; no pacifist doctrine ever maintained a nation; and we cannot allow a destructive and a subversive doctrine to undermine the moral fiber of this Nation or to render it powerless to protect itself in time of need.

I am not militaristic. I, too, would like to believe that never again will we be forced into taking up arms against any nation on earth. I realize, also, that there is with us always a fundamental need for economy in the operation of our Government activities; but to insure the peace and security of this Nation I place the maintenance of adequate national defense above and beyond any financial consideration. As a matter of fact, the cost of maintaining our present defense system is surprisingly small in comparison with the cost of other activities of the Federal Government. In normal times less than 13 cents out of every dollar appropriated by the Congress are spent for the combined maintenance of the Army and the Navy. If we take into consideration the funds being expended for emergency purposes this year, we will find that probably not more than 6 or 7 cents out of every dollar expended by the Federal Government for all purposes are being spent for national defense. Surely our 130,000,000 people are willing to spend in the neighborhood of $4.50 each year to insure this Nation against war. That is the approximate per capita cost of our land forces, and it seems to me to be the least costly of any insurance policy we may carry.

However, I did not come before you tonight to plead the cause of national defense. I wish rather to discuss briefly with you our defensive needs, to outline the policies under which they are being developed, and to inform you of the manner in which our military forces are performing their respective missions.

I feel certain that a great majority of our people as they come to a more comprehensive understanding of these things, will insist upon maintaining a program of national defense consistent with our status among the nations of the world. The minimum requirements of such a program are authoritatively stated in general as not less than 14,000 officers and 165,000 enlisted men in the Regular Army; a National Guard of 210,000 men with an appropriate number of officers; an Officers' Reserve Corps with 120,000 members and provisions for training approximately 30,000 Reserve officers each year; a Reserve Officers' Training Corps in every college and school that desires it, and a system of Citizen's Military Training Camps that will give intensive training to 50,000 young men on a voluntary basis each summer.

In addition to this we require comprehensive planning for procurement of supplies and munitions that would be needed in war, and reasonable appropriations for the conduct of the national rifle matches and assistance to civilian rifle clubs.

Paralleling these requirements in land forces are those for a Navy of full-treaty strength second to none in the world and able to protect our foreign trade, our commerce, and our outlying possessions. I believe this statement of minimum defense requirements is entirely reasonable, and I am convinced that each deficit, if any, of the categories mentioned places us that much nearer the point of national defenselessness.

By reason of successive reductions since the amendment of the National Defense Act in 1920, our Regular Army today numbers approximately 12,000 officers and 118,000 enlisted men; the National Guard numbers approximately 14,000 officers and 175,000 enlisted men; and the Officers' Reserve Corps has approximately 85,000 members. Lack of funds has seriously curtailed essential military training, research, and development work and the procurement of needed modern equipment.

The National Defense Act, to which I have referred, prescribes the basic military policy of the United States. It was formulated primarily from our experiences in the World War and represents the authoritative and studied recommendations of military leaders, Members of Congress, and patriotic citizens who served the Nation during that harrowing period. It reflects the essential peace mindedness and nonaggressive attitude of the Nation and recognizes the principle that the ultimate defense of our country is a responsibility of the country's entire citizenry and is not dependent upon the maintenance in peace time of a large standing army of professional soldiery.

To resist the first shock of invasion and furnish the skilled leadership necessary to train a citizen army and to direct its efforts effectively against an enemy, it prescribes a highly efficient nucleus consisting of the small Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Organized Resedves.

Each of these elements has its assigned mission in our defense system, and these missions cannot be performed fully if reductions in personnel and in funds are continued.

The National Guard and the Officers' Reserve Corps constitute the civilian components of the trained defensive forces. With the Regular Army they form a cadre around which, in the event of a war emergency, our great army of citizen soldiers must be organized. It is vitally important that each of these elements be ready to meet the demands that would inevitably be made upon it if America's millions of male citizens should be called to take up arms in defense of their country.

To provide replacements in the Officers' Reserve Corps, and to give our youth the rudiments of military training, we have developed a system that is peculiarly American.

The Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizens' military training camps are vital factors in our system of military education for civilians. Through them our young manhood receives healthful recreation and valuable training in citizenship, in the fundamentals of discipline, and in leadership. These youth are rendering invaluable service to the Nation, and in return are receiving benefits which will stay with them throughout their lives. They obtain a strengthening of their moral, mental, and physical fiber which makes them more capable for the duties of peace and the discharge of their obligations as good citizens. The training which they receive is not designed to create an army or even a militaristic spirit. It does teach obedience, self-control, and the ability to coordinate minds and bodies. It inspires a love for life in the great outdoors, which breeds a respect for the laws of nature and the laws of man. And, finally, it serves notice to the world, and especially to a rabid pacifist element, that American citizenship and American manhood are being developed to insure a continuation of those qualifications which have always distinguished a free people from a vassal state. Let us not be persuaded to interrupt the program by any ideas of false economy or because of economic emergencies.

The Regular Army is the only element of our land defenses that is in constant service. It forms the laboratory for experiment and research and serves in an instructional capacity for the civilian components. It must at all times be in readiness for immediate action for use in emergency, while at the same time it is performing a multitude of purely civil tasks which are of vital importance to the welfare of the American people both from a utilitarian and from a humanitarian standpoint.

As examples, consider the long record of the Engineer Corps in developing our rivers and harbors. The vast sums that have been economically and efficiently expended under the supervision of this corps are seen in our magnificent harbors, in the constantly increasing network of navigable rivers, and in the great works provided to lessen the dangers of floods. The Inland Waterways Corporation, the Panama Canal, and the Insular Bureau, all of which report directly to the Secretary of War, are agencies of Government whose purposes and accomplishments are well known.

Consider also the efficient manner in which the task of enrolling, feeding, clothing, housing, conditioning, and medical care of the two contingents of the Civilian Conservation Corps has been performed.

It must be apparent that the Army is the only agency of our Government that has the organization, the facilities, and the trained personnel suitable and capable of accomplishing these tasks without delay, without confusion, and without extravagance.

The procurement of food, clothing, shelter, and other supplies needed by the 300,000 men of the Civilian Conservation Corps presented a splendid opportunity to test the efficiency of the Army's procurement system as it has been developed under the National Defense Act. The successful manner in which this procurement program has been accomplished attests to the value of the extensive planning that is being carried on continually under the supervision of the Assistant Secretary of War.

One of the lessons brought home to us forcefully during the World War, and perpetuated in the National Defense Act, was that armies of today must depend for their effectiveness upon the ability of the nation to produce supplies and munitions of war. An army is an insatiable consumer of materials, and if the flow of needed supplies is definitely stopped the defeat of the force is certain. Preparation for defense, therefore, involves more than providing for the mobilization and training of personnel. We must have also the assurance that we can produce the necessary supplies in time and in sufficient quantity.

America is often called an "industrial colossus", but how many people know that, though we were actively engaged in the World War for 19 months, every tank and every cannon, except for a few special pieces, used by the American Army in that conflict were furnished by our allies? In most types of airplanes the same was true.

We had entered the war with little or no conception of the enormous quantities of supplies and munitions needed by a modern fighting force. To an even greater extent we were lacking in the knowledge of where to get what was required. There was no prepared program to show what was needed, where to get it, and when to get it. Our factories were not prepared to turn from the pursuits of peace to the manufacture of intricate weapons and machinery of war. Difficulties arose in attempting to make the best use of labor, raw materials, money, power, and transportation. These difficulties had not been visualized, and no comprehensive plan of action had been prepared. Every condition had to be met as it arose by a process of improvization. Orders for supplies and equipment were placed with little regard for the capacity of the particular locality to produce them. Excessive labor migrations and acute traffic congestions resulted. During the winter of 1918 thousands of loaded cars were rushed to our eastern ports. Our terminal yards from Harrisburg eastward were overflowing and our transportation system became practically paralyzed. However, supplies and munitions had to be procured, and time was the vital element. Under such conditions extravagance, profiteering, and costly delays were unavoidable.

Under the mandate of the National Defense Act there is being developed in my office, in cooperation with industry, detailed plans to facilitate prompt production of the supplies necessary in war. Provision is made for the organization in an emergency of special civilian agencies to assist the President in exercising control of all the Nation's resources. Each farm and factory, each mill and mine will be required to perform its duty to the country in support of the armed forces and in supplying the necessities of life to the civilian population. The plans contemplate simply that the burdens of war shall be borne equally by the country's entire citizenry, and that the most effective use shall be made of our economic resources. We aim to see to it that unscrupulous individuals shall not profit at the expense of the people while the youth of the country are offering their very lives in defense of the Nation.

Nothing contained in these plans is inconsistent with the essential peace-mindedness of the people of the United States. We abhor war, but we cannot neglect a reasonable effort toward national security. Our country has nothing but the kindest feelings for every other nation on the globe. Thoughtful citizens cannot fail to give their hearty approval to the continuous and fruitful efforts of President Roosevelt in strengthening friendly international relationships. The full power of his statesmanship is being brought to bear in finding sound and amicable solutions to the many complex international problems which have been stifling world trade and fostering international ill feeling.

But he realizes that the millenium of world peace has not yet arrived. His action in approving the allotment of Public Works funds to build up our sadly neglected naval forces; to furnish essential housing facilities and motorized equipment for the land forces; and to provide more adequate Air Corps equipment is convincing evidence that he does not intend to see America become defenseless in a world of nations who continue to rearm instead of to disarm.

I am convinced that from the standpoint of professional efficiency and correct organization our Army ranks second to none in the world today. If built up to its minimum requirements and properly equipped, the American Army can and will perform efficiently any task that may be assigned to it by our Commander in Chief. It has demonstrated that it is a most powerful weapon in combating the moral and social problems which beset the Nation, and that it is capable of exerting stabilizing influences not to be exceeded by any other instrumentality of government. In peace or in war it stands ready to serve the people and to uphold the constituted authority.

I hope that we may never be forced to employ these forces in armed conflict. I want to say with the firmest conviction that our primary purpose in maintaining an adequate national defense is to prevent war.

The most successful army is one that is never required to fire a shot.

But whenever our national honor and our heritage of free institutions should be menaced, let us be prepared to use our military strength, swiftly and with its utmost effectiveness.

THE FINANCIAL AND MONETARY SYSTEM

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order at any time for the House to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H.R. 6976) to protect the currency system of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, and in the consideration of said bill that all points of order shall be considered as waived.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I wish to make this statement: The Committee on Banking and Currency felt keenly disappointed at the ruling which referred the consideration of this bill to another committee. Many members of the Committee on Banking and Currency for years have devoted great study to the subject of this legislation. The committee has held repeated hearings on the subject and has the testimony of the leading economists of the Nation.

The question of parliamentary procedure is settled for the time, and to this ruling, of course, we bow respectfully. Meantime, however, members of the Committee on Banking and Currency adhere steadfastly to their view that legislation affecting money should be considered by this committee.

On yesterday the committee reported with an amendment a bill which had been introduced some months ago by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and which embodied much of the substance of the bill introduced on Monday by me and which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. The action of the Committee on Banking and Currency yesterday, in effect, was an amendment to the Goldsborough bill which it was thought by all members of the committee was germane to that bill. The amendment simply strikes out all after the enacting clause and inserts the bill which had been referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. This action was taken, we thought, within parliamentary rules for the reason that the committee had before it at the time a bill which had been referred to the committee to which the amendment was germane, and which had not been withdrawn; and the reference of this bill to our committee carried with it a mandate that the committee, as the servants of the House, should give it consideration.

It was recognized by the committee that the ruling of the Speaker transferred the bill to the other committee. It was thought proper, however, to consider the bill before us and make a report that the matter might be left to the House for such action as it might see fit to take, but with no thought on the part of the committee of asking the House to take up the bill of the Committee on Banking and Currency in preference to the other bill.

In deference to the ruling of the Chair it was our thought that if either committee reported a bill along the same line it should be considered; and we are now happy to join in the consent to take up the bill reported by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. Our chief concern is the welfare of the country and a desire to expedite the program of the President. The members of the Committee on Banking and Currency were invited to attend a conference to consider that program and it is our desire to hasten its adoption.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I got the request correctly it was that we give unanimous consent to take up the bill which has been referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and this morning reported to the House. I may say to the majority leader, considering the importance of the bill and how vitally it affects not only the present generation but several generations to come, it seems to me that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has not yet had sufficient time to secure the information that should have been given to the committee and, in my judgment, is absolutely necessary before we pass on such an important measure. It seems to me further that we should have a little more time, and I hope the gentleman will not press the request today. Later on, when we have had a chance to study the bill and find out what the information is, we may feel a little differently in regard to it.

I have no desire—nor has anyone on this side of the House—to block any of the President's emergency measures, but this is so important that we feel we should have all the information available. I was told by the chairman of the committee that he expected to have quite extended hearings before it was reported to the House.

Mr. BYRNS. The bill has been reported. I take it the committee which ordered its report is for the bill and naturally would be anxious to dispose of it as soon as possible. I am told that the Secretary of the Treasury says it is of the utmost importance that this bill be given just as early consideration as possible, and, while I am not quoting him, I happen to know that it is the President's hope that the Congress will not delay consideration of this bill.

The bill has been published; it is on the calendar today; it was placed there yesterday and introduced the day before. There can be no reason, therefore, in my judgment, why this bill cannot be taken up and disposed of—not today, but tomorrow. I do not know what the Committee on Rules would do if the Rules Committee were requested to make it in order, but it seems to me, in connection with a bill of this importance, that it ought not to be necessary to appeal for a rule to take it up immediately when we have ample time this week to consider it and pass it. If Saturday is needed for further consideration of it, of course, it is highly agreeable to everybody on this side; but we ought to be able, with the time that we have today to devote to the appropriation for the Department of the Interior, to pass this bill and the Department of the Interior appropriation bill tomorrow. We could do this and then take a recess over until Monday. But I hope that the House will stay here on Saturday if we cannot pass it tomorrow. This will enable us to dispose of the bill this week.

It is unheard of after a bill has been reported—and the committee, I understand, is unanimously for it, or at least I have been so advised—to stop consideration of the bill after the report has been made and hold extended hearings on the bill lasting, possibly, over an indefinite length of time.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has held out the bait that we would adjourn over Saturday several times if we would hurry up and pass legislation. I think it is more important for this House to stay in session on Saturday if it has important work to do.

Mr. BYRNS. I have not the slightest objection to staying in session on Saturday. I was expressing the hope it would be passed tomorrow. If it does not pass tomorrow, I think the House ought to stay here and pass it Saturday.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman himself early in the session said that he hoped on important legislation we would give it due and considerate attention.

Mr. BYRNS. Why certainly. We all think that.

Mr. SNELL. I make the claim that a measure of such importance to the people of the entire country as this one is, referred one day to the committee and reported out the next has not had the attention that its importance demands.

Mr. BYRNS. How much time does the gentleman think should be devoted to discussion of this bill? There is only one proposition to be settled. How much time does the gentleman recommend should be consumed?

Mr. SNELL. I doubt if we are ready to grant this unanimous-consent request, although I do not say that a little later on we would not do so.

Mr. BYRNS. I am going to ask the Rules Committee, and I do not know that they will do it, but I do hope the Rules Committee will report a rule this afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. All right. I appreciate that the gentleman has the right to do that and he has the power to do it.

Mr. BYRNS. I have not the power, but I am going to make the request.

Mr. SNELL. But we want reasonable time in which to give some attention to the most important domestic problem that has been before the Congress in the last 50 years.

Mr. BYRNS. This request of mine, I will say to the gentleman from New York, does not involve the waiver of any privilege that any Member of the House has, except that all points of order on the bill shall be considered as waived.

Mr. SNELL. That is quite an important point, it seems to me.

Mr. BYRNS. The only point, I will say to the gentleman from New York, frankly, as I understand this bill, and the only reason for making the request is the fact that there is a portion of the bill which may be considered as carrying with it an appropriation. This is a very simple matter, and, of course, if it is held to carry with it an appropration, a point of order would lie under the rules of the House. This is the only object I have in asking for the waiver of all points of order.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to correct one statement, made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], pertaining to the report of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. This committee has had under consideration for over a year and a half, and has held extensive hearings on the question of metallic money. When this bill was introduced the Speaker, under the precedents, referred it to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, inviting the Banking and Currency Committee to go through the orderly process of appealing to the House from the decision of the Chair. But here is what happened. Yesterday the Banking and Currency Committee dug up the old Goldsborough bill, struck out everything after the enacting clause, and substituted therefore this piece of proposed legislation.

By this piece of legerdemain the Banking and Currency Committee was undertaking to overthrow the decision of the Speaker of the House, and as an affront to the House itself, would not appeal to the House from the decision of the Speaker. The Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee, in self-defense, trying to uphold the integrity of the committee, has reported this bill to the House.

I am giving away no secrets when I say that the primary reason for the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee being forced to make the early report now is to defend itself from the piracy of the Banking and Currency Committee in coming in and trying to take the bill away from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

What we want to do is to hold some hearings, which will not be extensive and will not last more than 2 or 3 days. We want to be able to give this House an intelligent understanding of this bill as best we can.

The report of the Committee on Banking and Currency says it has had the matter under consideration for 10 years. The important and vital part of this bill—section 10—they have not had under consideration for 10 years, because no one ever heard of this equalization plan of a $2,000,000,000 fund until within the last few days.

If the House will give the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures an opportunity to proceed in an orderly manner, as every other committee has had the opportunity to do, it will report this bill promptly. I think the committee should have the opportunity of holding not to exceed 2 days of legitimate hearings. If we cannot have this, of course, we will have to bring the bill in without any consideration.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, the gentleman has made some remarks with reference to the Committee on Banking and Currency to which, possibly, some of us would not accede.

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not think there is serious disagreement down deep in the gentleman's own heart.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not think some of us will agree to the gentleman's statement in view of the statement made by the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee a little while ago. Everybody now concedes the jurisdiction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, but I may say to the gentleman that in this hour, when the Secretary of the Treasury says it is of the utmost importance that this bill become law, for two or three reasons with which the gentleman is entirely familiar, we should not delay its passage when practically every man on the floor of this House now knows how he is going to vote for it. There is no question about this and I dare say the gentleman himself will not say now that even if it had a week's hearing the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures would change its report. Why should we delay for that purpose?

Mr. McGUGIN. I think the committee might make one or two modest changes.

Mr. BYRNS. Then why cannot the committee have the hearings this afternoon and in the morning, and propose such amendments when the bill comes up for consideration? We are not seeking to cut off debate. We are not seeking to deprive any Member of opportunity to propose amendments. We are simply asking you to take this bill up under the orderly procedure of the House and proceed to its consideration and disposition, in view of the fact that those in charge of the fiscal affairs of this Nation say it is of the utmost importance that the bill be considered promptly.

Mr. McGUGIN. We all concede that and if the gentleman will amend his request and make the bill the special order of business Saturday, I think everybody will agree to it.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not even ask that it be considered Saturday. I am simply asking that the bill be given a privileged status.

Mr. McGUGIN. I think it should be understood that the committee is to have 2 or 3 days to deliberate over the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. When the bill is called up, the House can postpone its consideration if it sees fit to do so. I simpy ask that this bill be given a privileged status and the House will determine whether or not it is to be considered when the measure is called up.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has referred to an appropriation in this bill. I should like to know the amount of the appropriation and what it is for.

Mr. BYRNS. The message states that. I have not the bill before me and I am not able to tell the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is that the appropriation setting aside $2,000,000,000 as a "kitty", or as a stabilization fund, to be entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to deal in the buying and selling of gold and international exchange and Government bonds?

Mr. BYRNS. I did not make any reference to any particular appropriation, but I will say to the gentleman that inasmuch as the Bank of England has a fund of $3,500,000,000 for the purpose of stabilizing its currency and its foreign exchange, it is not too much for this Government and the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury to have a fund of $2,000,000,000 for the same purpose, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, knowing the subject of banking far better than I do, and certainly as much as any man in this House, I am sure will agree that the President ought to have some fund which he can use for the benefit of commodities and business generally of this country.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say that this is an important bill, and I, as one Member of the House, should like to hear the reasons set forth for it in detail. As yet we have none except the President's message. We alone are responsible here for what we do—and it is a serious responsibility—for any influence to press a bill of this magnitude without the Membership having full knowledge; and in the light of what has taken place this morning, I am going to use every power I can to delay the passage of this bill until we have definite and full information.

Mr. BYRNS. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has reported the bill favorably, and I have been informed that there was no opposition in the committee. I should like to ask my friend what he expects to get in any hearing after the bill has been reported and is on the calendar? It seems to me that the gentleman could get all the information from members of the committee, who will undoubtedly discuss it.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman knows that one member of the committee has stated here today that the committee intended to hold hearings, and the gentleman knows that the Senate Banking and Currency Committee are holding hearings now. There is no reason for the House to take precipitate action, because the gentleman knows the bill is not going to become a law until the Senate passes it.

Mr. BYRNS. I should like to ask the gentleman this question—I should like to ask the gentleman, whom does he expect to be heard and how many witnesses does he expect to appear before the committee before the House takes it up? We have the report and we have the bill, and gentlemen have until tomorrow at 12 o'clock, even if the bill should be taken up tomorrow. The committee can conduct hearings this afternoon and tomorrow morning. It seems to me the request is a reasonable one, in view of the circumstances which demand an early consideration of this bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am not a member of the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee, nor am I a member of the Banking Committee. I understand that there are men who propose to appear before the committee who can give vital information and who are entitled to appear.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Who are those men?

Mr. McFADDEN. I understand there are a number of men who wish to appear.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Who are they?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have stated that I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and not one single person has requested to appear.

Mr. McFADDEN. This is an attempt to rush this bill through under another gag rule.

Mr. BYRNS. There is no such intention as that.

Mr. McFADDEN. I object.

LEAVE FOR COMMITTEE ON COINAGE, WEIGHTS, AND MEASURES TO SIT DURING THE SESSION OF THE HOUSE TODAY

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, if it so desires, may sit during the session of the House this afternoon. We may want to have a hearing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1935

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 6951) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. Cox in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss H.R. 6976, which is the bill we were discussing a few moments ago. It is one of the most far-reaching pieces of legislation that has come before the Congress in many years. I would ask each Member today to obtain for himself a copy of that bill. The contents of the bill is not so simple as one might think from reading press reports. The devaluation of the gold dollar is only a small part of the bill. Believe me, when I tell you, there are parts of the bill which reach to the most fundamental principles of democracy and our form of government. I am not saying that I am going to oppose that one particular part; I am inclined to think that we have reached the place where we must have the substance of it. I hope when you get a copy of this bill you will look at section 10, on page 8. This section places in the Secretary of the Treasury authority to buy foreign exchange, to buy bonds of this country, or of other countries. It gives him the use of a $2,000,000,000 fund, by the use of which the price of the dollar can be run up or down, the price of the British pound can be run up or down, the price of the French franc, the price of the money of any country in the world, can be run up or down, and it places in the hands of the Secretary the sum of $2,000,000,000, a staggering amount of money.

Do not understand me to say at this particular moment that I am criticising this section. I am not so certain but that with the international complications growing out of the British equalization fund, such a fund perhaps is necessary, but what may grow out of that in years to come no man can conceive. It may be war. There is no telling what international complications it may lead to. With such a responsibility upon the Congress, it seems to me such legislation should be considered with the utmost deliberation, not only by the committee to whom it is entrusted, but by the Members of this House. For instance, I have in mind that this section should be modified at least with a time provision as to how long it shall be effective. Pass the legislation as it is in the bill, and you are not just passing legislation to turn over to the present Secretary of the Treasury $2,000,000,000 with which to speculate in foreign exchange and control the value of money, thereby controlling the prices of commodities. That is only a part of what you are doing. You are placing that permanent authority in the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, whoever he may be during the years to come.

On the Democratic side of the House some 150 to 200 new Members came into Congress last fall. The truth is that most of you slid in because of opposition and enmity to the former Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew Mellon. Had this legislation been passed 10 years ago, the power you are now asked to give your Secretary of the Treasury would have been in the hands of Mr. Mellon. At least those of you who came into this Congress in vicious opposition to the former Secretary should go slow when you are considering legislation which gives power to the Secretary of the Treasury now and forever more to control the value of money and the prices of commodities not only at home but abroad. The power to stabilize prices and run them up carries with it the power to run prices down. To say the least, there should be an amendment to this provision, in my judgment, that it shall not be effective for a longer period than 2 years.

Then at that future time if Congress wants to continue the program, it can do so; but if we pass it as permanent legislation, what will be the picture? If some future Congress wants to change it, it cannot do it without riding over the veto of some President of the United States, and, whether that President be the present President or some other President, I dare say that he will veto such legislation as seeks to take from him authority. Congress should not give away that right forever. That is one of the things involved in this bill. I dare say most of you think that what is involved in it is just the devaluation of the dollar. If that were all, we could pass it through Congress in 5 minutes and no great harm could be done, as the President can now, under power given him during the last session of Congress, devalue the gold dollar.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I am very much impressed with the gentleman's argument that we ought to take some considerable time for the consideration of this momentous question, but does not the gentleman think that when we take the drastic step of devaluing the gold dollar we ought to set up some institution that would control foreign exchanges just like this?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MAY. I am impressed, likewise, with the suggestion that it ought to be for a limited time, as we did with respect to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; but, in any event, it ought to be done along with the devaluation of the dollar.

Mr. McGUGIN. I may say to my friend that I am impressed by the necessity of getting along rather rapidly with this legislation. I think the safe thing to do is to go ahead and pass the legislation and give this power to the Secretary of the Treasury for a limited time, to operate for a year or a year and a half, and in the meantime Congress can deliberate more extensively and work out some kind of a board to handle this subject.

Mr. MAY. The whole proposition is an emergency measure for the time we are in now.

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes; and being an emergency measure is no justification for at the same time ramming through permanent legislation which vests in the Secretary of the Treasury power that should not be vested in any one man indefinitely.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is not the gentleman well aware that this is only a part of the program which is to be carried out, as intimated in the message of the President to the Congress on last Monday? The President intimated possibly a redistribution of all of the gold. Does the gentleman not know that the administration of this is going to be under the domination of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, which, in turn, is dominated by the international financiers, and that a plan is on to redistribute the gold that is in the United States?

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not know. I cannot answer the gentleman intelligently. That may be true. But the point is, England, with her equalization board that has power to administer her equalization fund of $1,700,000,000, has it vested in a board of three men; not in the Chancellor of the Exchequer but in a board of three men.

I think if we are going to carry out such a program indefinitely it would be far better to create a board of some three or four men to administer this fund. The point is, I think it is dangerous as a matter of permanent legislation to enact this legislation in this emergency bill, which vests in the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be from now on, this unlimited power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. McGUGIN. That is the one point that I think deserves deliberation and consideration of not only the committee but of the House.

Section 13 of that bill carries this provision:

> All actions, regulations, rules, orders, and proclamations heretofore taken, promulgated, made, or issued by the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of March 9, 1933, or under section 43 or section 45 of title III of the act of May 12, 1933, are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed.

That seems rather innocent, but let us see how far-reaching that may be. The Thomas amendment, which is one of those provisions, was at least temporary legislation, granting to the President temporary authority. I make bold the assertion that there is no Member of this Congress who knows or has a reasonable understanding of all the regulations and proclamations that have been issued by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury since last March on these two acts of legislation. Yet we are called upon to sit here and vote to ratify and confirm them all. Perhaps I am in favor of ratifying them, but I do not know. I do not know what they are, and I want time, and I want every Member of this House to have time to deliberate and to vote intelligently, if we are going to vote on such far-reaching legislation.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman have the view of the thing that the committee which reported this bill with that provision in it probably felt that the previous acts of the President on this question were not authorized by the legislation which we passed, and that it needed ratification by Congress?

Mr. McGUGIN. No. I think they were authorized. I think this is only saying we might make it permanent. As far as the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures is concerned, as was stated a moment ago, the report they made was only in defense of their committee in reporting a bill which had been sent to them, because the Committee on Banking and Currency had done a wholly unprecedented thing of bringing in this bill which is now in another committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN] has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MONTET].

Mr. MONTET. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, January 17, the time limit expired for the acceptance of the Philippine Independence Act by the Filipinos. The failure of the Philippine Legislature to provide for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention, under the provisions of the said act, is, in fact, a rejection of the act which renders it null and void under its own provisions. Therefore, all of the labors of Congress in its efforts to give freedom and independence to the Filipino people have come to naught, by the action of the Filipino people themselves or perhaps it is nearer the fact to state, by the act of certain Filipino leaders.

As far as I am personally concerned, I have always contended Congress should give to the Filipino people their immediate and complete independence which I sincerely believe they want. In the last session of Congress I introduced a bill, which, if passed by Congress, would have placed the Filipinos in a position where they could actually have some form of independence today.

In view of the rejection of the offer which the Congress of the United States made to the Filipinos in the form of the Hawes-Cutting Act we have to start anew, and to this end I have today introduced an independence bill granting to the Filipino people complete independence as quickly as it is possible to bring it about.

There is in Washington today a mission headed by a Mr. Quezon, which ostensibly came to the United States for the purpose of securing independence. As a matter of fact, I am convinced that this mission has only sought to obstruct the effectuation of the Hawes-Cutting Act. As far as anyone knows, they have done nothing to bring about a situation whereby it would have been possible for the Filipino people to express themselves on the form of independence offered them, or to secure any changes which they might claim to be necessary. It is a well-known fact that this mission called on the President of the United States and were asked by the President to submit in writing the amendments or changes which they desired. As far as we know the mission has not even gone to the trouble of making the gesture of submitting a program in writing to the President. In short, it is my interpretation of their attitude that they have come to Washington as obstructionists and that they have been successful in preventing any further action under the act of Congress.

It is difficult to understand how so-called leaders of a potential Nation could have permitted themselves to carry such an affront to the Congress of the United States. The action of Congress in passing the Hawes-Cutting bill was the result of many months of labor, receiving more than two thirds vote in both Houses of Congress, indicating that it represented the well-considered opinion of more than the majority of both Houses. The first reaction which anyone normally has to the failure to accept this offer of Congress on any basis, would be that the Filipino people are ungrateful and unworthy of considerate treatment. But I am convinced that it is not the voice of a majority of the Philippine people which has spoken, but rather a temporary political leadership which has interested itself in securing industrial concessions as paramount to the human and national rights of their people.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTET. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Is it not probable that the commission is here now feeling out a way to secure those industrial concessions?

Mr. MONTET. It is rather obvious to me that such is the purpose.

Only a few days ago we heard the sincere and eloquent appeal of one whom I consider to be truly representative of the culture, of the ideals, and the desires of the Philippine nation. All of us who sat in the last Congress will remember the spontaneous enthusiasm and emotional reaction which was stirred by Commissioner OSIAS when he made his final appeal for the freedom and independence of his people, just before the House voted on the Hare bill. Commissioner OSIAS was asking Congress this week to extend the time during which a constitutional convention might be set up for the purpose of accepting the Independence Act. I am sure that most of the Members of Congress were astounded by the statement which the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands made when he said "that the Filipino people themselves have not been given an opportunity to act on the law." His explanation of that statement by the declaration of facts which he made on the floor has convinced me of the soundness of his statement.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that while the Commissioner and the Ninth Philippine Independence Commission were in Washington working for the freedom and independence of their people, certain politicians and capitalists were undermining them at home for their selfish purposes. Why, I even understand that a resolution was introduced in the Philippine Legislature condemning Commissioner OSIAS, when I am sure that every Member of the Seventy-second Congress will testify to the fact that as a champion of the cause of his people and as a worker for their interests he stands a peer among the patriots and the statesmen of all time.

I am unwilling to stand by and permit this intrigue of politicians and capitalists with investments in the Philippine Islands to defeat the will of Congress and the wishes of the Filipino people. Therefore the bill which I have introduced gives to these people an opportunity to express themselves in accordance with parliamentary forms and democratic practices upon the question of their independence and the formation of their government.

Mr. Chairman, it has been charged in certain newspapers of the country that the Hawes-Cutting Act was conceived by the farming interests of the United States and is not the result of any desire to help the Filipino people. Everyone knows that the Philippine independence bills were enacted into law under the leadership of men who not only did not represent districts whose products enter into competition with the Philippines, but these Members of Congress have been for many years recognized and hailed by the Filipino people themselves as statesmen friendly to the people of those islands and desirous primarily of giving to them their freedom, liberty, and independence, which as Commissioner OSIAS says, "The Filipino people continue in the firm conviction that the early grant of Philippine independence is the proper solution of American-Filipino relations. On this fundamental point the Filipinos are united." Naturally, Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the welfare and I am concerned with the distress of people in my district. I am proud, rather than apologetic as some newspapers would suggest, of the fact that I am able to champion the cause of my own people in the matter of trade relations between the Filipinos and the Americans. I consider it to be my duty to maintain the protection of the American farmers who reside in my district, which it has been the policy of the United States Government to give them throughout the years of our history.

The sugar farmers of my district pay taxes. When roads are to be built, they vote the bond issues and assume the burden. When the Government of the United States needs money, as it does so much now, those among them who still have incomes, divide with their Government. When war comes, their sons join in the ranks for the defense of their country. To meet the obligations that come hand in hand with citizenship, my people give willingly of their time, of their money, of their blood, and of their lives. Certainly, under these circumstances, it is blasphemy to say that the action of their Representative is "sordid" when he seeks to secure for them the privileges that go along with American citizenship.

I judge that in this matter of trade relations with the Philippine Islands the attitude of the capitalists of the Philippine sugar industry has been most selfish, grasping, and unjustified. It will be remembered that the proponents of the quota which appeared in the Philippine Independence Act appealed to their fellow Members of Congress to permit the status quo for all industries in the Philippine Islands. In the case of sugar, it was contended that the opportunity should be given the Philippine sugar industry to readjust itself gradually to the restrictions that necessarily must come when the Philippines become an independent nation.

Instead of readjusting themselves, they have redoubled their efforts with the gloating selfishness of a gourmand, to increase the production of sugar to most unreasonable bounds, so that the problem of economic readjustment has become more acute and more serious instead of easier to solve. In 1930 the Philippine sugar production was 793,728 tons, a formidable increase over the 164,867 short tons in 1921. In 1932, at the time of the consideration of the Hawes-Cutting bill, the status quo was fixed at 956,920 short tons. But instead of accepting this economic limit on the part of Congress officially made, we find these greedy sugar capitalists of the Philippines, unmindful of the human and personal rights of the Filipino people, driving with every bit of their money, resources, and human endeavor to increase their production to 1,400,000 tons.

Mr. Chairman, if anyone is guilty of sordid bad faith, these capitalists are the guilty ones and not the Filipino people nor the American Congressmen who lift their voices for American farmers.

It is easy to understand why there has been no action on the Philippine Independence Act under the manipulations of politicians and capitalists whose only interest appears to be the exploitation of the Filipino people and not the independence of the Filipinos.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that the Congress of the United States will not permit its own will and the will of the Filipino people to continue in defeat under the machinations of so-called "leaders" in temporary control. I urge that the bill which I have introduced be given immediate consideration, and in view of the elections which will be held in the Philippine Islands this summer, an opportunity will thus be given to the Filipino people themselves to express their wishes regarding independence, so that the will of the people may prevail. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MONTET] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTET. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Does the bill which the gentleman has offered provide for immediate independence?

Mr. MONTET. Immediate, in the only sense you can use the word "immediate", when we consider the fact that we must provide for the establishment of a constitutional government, and so forth.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman voted last spring to override the President's veto?

Mr. MONTET. I did.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. On the basis of Filipino gratitude to the American people for what they have done for them?

Mr. MONTET. I voted for it because I am for Philippine independence.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I am proud of the fact that I was the only Democrat on this side of the House that voted with my Republican friends, because we realized that the Filipinos would do just exactly what they have done now.

Mr. MONTET. And I am equally proud that I voted with the majority, even though the legislation in question was far from what I believed it should have been. The bill just introduced by me is much fairer to all concerned.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I think that is where the gentleman was deceived.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MONTET] has again expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose to discuss the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway during the time allotted me. Under ordinary circumstances I would be unwilling to take up the time of the House in presenting this matter which is properly before the Senate and involves the ratification of the treaty now pending before that body. But here on the floor within the last week attacks have been made on this project which have no foundation either in sound economics or sound nationalism. Attacks have also been made on the integrity and patriotism of the United States engineers which should be answered.

May I add that part of the district I represent in this body is situated along the St. Lawrence River and is vitally concerned in a material way in the successful carrying out of this project. I am emboldened therefore to discuss with you briefly the character of this treaty and its probable effect on the economic life of the Nation if it is ratified by the other body.

May I say in the beginning that the St. Lawrence seaway has two objects, namely, navigation and power. The construction of this seaway will admit ocean vessels from the Atlantic to the Great Lakes. Ratification of the treaty will add 3,500 miles to the coast line of the United States. It brings the Atlantic Ocean 1,000 miles inland.

It will lessen the economic handicaps of adverse transportation costs to the vast area in the interior of the American Continent. This area embraces more than 22 States. Within these States are more than 40,000,000 people who gain their livelihood from agricultural production and manufacturing. It cannot be denied that the people of this inland section have had their progress retarded both from manufacturing and agricultural standpoints by handicaps in transportation.

The building of the Panama Canal left them marooned in the interior of the continent. It placed on them unfair handicaps in the matters of transportation. During the greater part of the last few years railroad rates for transportation per 100 miles on corn, wheat, and other staple products cost more than the product actually sold for in the market at the termination of the transit. There can be no question in any reasonable mind that the people in these inland areas of the United States are entitled to relief from the present exorbitant and destructive freight rates. The potential tonnage of this waterway is 30,174,625 tons.

WHAT THE SEAWAY IS

Let me first give you a bird's-eye view of what this project is. The treaty provides for a deep waterway from the central portion of the North American Continent to the Atlantic Ocean by way of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River. It includes the improvement and deepening of the channels to 27 feet between the Great Lakes and the sea, from Lake Superior through Lake Huron into Lake Erie, and thence into Lake Ontario and the improvement of the St. Lawrence River from the outlet of Lake Ontario, where it provides for a deep-water channel already provided by the Canadian Government at that point. The total cost of this improvement is $543,000,000, of which approximately $272,000,000 will need to be expended by the United States. Some of the work has already been done and the total amount of new funds to be called on from the United States is $258,000,000. From this sum must be deducted $90,000,000 to be paid by the State of New York, which takes over the 1,250,000 horsepower developed on the American side of the international section. The Federal Government's disbursement is therefore $168,000,000.

President Hoover, who was an economist of the orthodox school and had no illusions about the work that a dollar should do, stated on July 18, 1932, at the time the treaty was signed by him:

> The St. Lawrence Treaty marks another step forward in the greatest internal improvement yet undertaken on the North American Continent. * * * The treaty provides for the construction of a 27-foot waterway from the sea to all ports on the Great Lakes. Its influence in cheapening transportation of overseas goods will spread widely into the interior. * * * Its completion will have a profoundly favorable effect upon the development of agriculture and industry throughout the Midwest. * * * The economic gains from improved transportation have always benefited the whole people.

On Wednesday, January 10, 1934, President Roosevelt, in a ringing message to the Senate urging the ratification of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, stated:

> Broad national reasons lead me without hesitation to advocate the treaty. * * * I subscribe to the definite belief that the completion of the seaway will greatly serve the economic and transportation needs of a vast area of the United States and should therefore be considered solely from the national point of view.

This is a definite call to arms to the Senate and the country which should not and cannot be ignored. After enumerating the great benefits which the developments of the power will bring to the people of the Northeast, the President continues:

I have not stressed the fact that the starting of this great work will put thousands of unemployed to work. I have preferred to stress the great future advantages to our country and especially the fact that all of us should view this treaty in the light of the benefits which it confers on the people of the United States as a whole.

Rising above the selfish demands of localities whether they be States or municipalities, President Roosevelt's message is a definite challenge to the national spirit. It is a powerful and appealing argument which must convince even the most determined opponent of this great project that the welfare of all the people is the first consideration in the mind of the Executive. It is a clarion call to duty to the Senate and to the sectionalists who are mistakenly opposing the consummation of this great work.

The ancient curse of popular government such as ours is the selfishness of localities which place their imaginary and seeming benefits ahead of the national welfare. The fall of the Dutch Republic and numerous other States was due to weak nationalism. Absolutely unsound as to economics or the demands of decency, the cry of locality sometimes rises above the call to duty. Thus far not a single rational argument has been raised against the case so ably presented by these two great Presidents.

GREAT LAKES DIVERSION

One of the contentions is that it will prevent sufficient diversion of water from Lake Michigan at the city of Chicago for sanitary and navigation purposes. What does the treaty say about that?

Article 8 of the treaty recites:

The high contracting parties, recognizing their common interest in the preservation of the levels of the Great Lakes system, agree:

(a) 1. That the diversion of water from the Great Lakes system, through the Chicago Drainage Canal, shall be reduced by December 31, 1938, to the quantity permitted as of that date by the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States of April 21, 1930.

It will be seen, therefore, that both America and Canada accept the decision of the Supreme Court.

You perhaps know that we have spent on the Illinois waterway, running from Chicago to the Mississippi River, the sum of $16,000,000, and that we will in the near future, assuming that the present policy of Congress continues, appropriate $13,000,000 more for this purpose. Gradually, without warrant in municipal or natural law, there has been taken from the Great Lakes watershed annually from 5,000 to 10,000 cubic second-feet of water for the purposes of operating this canal for sanitary purposes. It is no secret that most of this water has been used by Chicago in generating electricity for commercial purposes. God intended this water to flow east through the Great Lakes. Its diversion was a larceny, pure and simple, and was destructive of the rights of every shore-front locality along the basin of the Great Lakes.

An action was commenced by several of the Great Lakes States against the State of Illinois which resulted in a decision by Special Master Charles Evans Hughes. This was before Judge Hughes went on the Supreme Court bench the second time. Judge Hughes held that there was no warrant at law or in nature for this diversion. The Supreme Court confirmed the report of the Special Master and fixed varying amounts for the years down to 1938, when the diversion was to be permanently fixed at 1,500 cubic second-feet. The decree also allowed domestic pumpage in the amount of 1,900 cubic second-feet, giving a total permanent diversion in 1938, and forever subsequent thereto, the sum of 3,400 cubic feet per second. In addition to this the water to be diverted there is the natural flow in the Illinois River. This would be much greater in volume than the diversion. In the opinion of Maj. Gen. Lytle Brown, former Chief of Engineers, this is amply sufficient for the purpose of navigation in the Illinois River. In a memorandum to the Secretary of War, dated July 21, 1932, General Brown gives the following details for several canalized rivers showing the amount of low-water flow required for navigation:

Waterway	Total canalized length	Total fall	Average low-water flow	Average yearly tonnage
	Miles		Cubic feet per second
Monongahela River	131	153.6	200	25,000,000
Ohio River	981	429.14	1,100	20,000,000
Panama Canal	51	85	1,300	28,000,000

The tonnage on the Illinois in 1932 was 189,176 tons and the Government has already spent $16,000,000 and is slated to spend $13,000,000 more.

General Brown is a great engineer and a profoundly patriotic American. He states that the permissible flow in the Illinois will be more than ample for any commerce that may develop on that waterway. General Brown's finding safeguards this waterway beyond peradventure. To my mind Chicago is making a pitiful spectacle of itself in the present controversy. May I say whatever Chicago has in the way of wealth, material, and cultural development is due to her position on the Great Lakes. Her resources and her population were recruited largely from the Lake States. With this waterway completed she would be the seat of empire on the Great Lakes. In this battle she has turned her back on her ancient heritage and has elected to align herself with the Mississippi River Valley crowd, whose bald purpose is to steal not only water, but commerce from the Great Lakes. Their purpose is to cripple the Great Lakes region by withdrawals of water from its natural watershed. Their purpose and intent is to increase this diversion and materially lower the level of the Lakes, "thereby injuriously affecting navigation." Nor has the procedure of some of these Mississippi Valley groups been particularly ethical. A typical example of this is the taking over by certain Mississippi River influences of the highly efficient and hitherto respectable National Rivers and Harbors Congress. The development of American waterways has suffered a distinct and permanent set-back by the introduction of certain noxious influences.

Certain gentlemen from the valley talk of their nationalism and their unwillingness to seem sectional. No one is fooled by that brand of claptrap. Anyone who runs may read that their primary purpose in this diversion is to procure water for navigation in the Mississippi River. Their secondary purpose is to destroy the navigability of the Great Lakes. Their actual purpose in opposing this treaty is to bring defeat to this great national project in the hope that they, themselves, will benefit by the diversion of traffic from the Great Lakes. They are dreaming, even as LaSalle dreamed, that an outlet on the Gulf with these areas as feeders would give them a year-round port to the seven seas.

The President of the United States is not fooled by their mouthings. In his message to the Senate he says:

I am convinced that the building of the St. Lawrence seaway * * * will not in any way interfere with the Mississippi or Missouri Rivers for navigation.

The President continues:

Let us be wholly frank in saying that it is better economics to send grain or other raw material from our Northwest to Europe via the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence than it is to send them around three sides of a square—via Texas ports or the Mississippi, thence through the Gulf of Mexico, and thence from the southern end of the North Atlantic to its northern end. In this illustration it is well to remember that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points.

Do you gentlemen of the House know how much we have spent on the Mississippi River and its tributaries to date and how much will have to be spent to complete disbursements in this section? It will amount to over a billion dollars. This of course includes flood control. The operation and maintenance of these waterways and flood-control phases in some of these areas is as high as 50 percent of the disbursement. However, I have averaged it at 10 percent. It makes a net annual disbursement when the waterway, its tributaries, and flood-control features are completed of approximately $100,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I did not understand just what the yearly maintenance cost of the Mississippi River project was estimated to be.

Mr. CULKIN. I have estimated it roughly, but I think conservatively, at $100,000,000 when all the projects contemplated and approved by the engineers have been completed.

Mr. SNELL. And this amount will be absolutely necessary to maintain it for a single year?

Mr. CULKIN. That is what the records show. This includes, of course, not only navigation but flood control.

Mr. SNELL. But there will be no such annual maintenance cost in the case of the St. Lawrence waterway?

Mr. CULKIN. Not at all. The excavations in the St. Lawrence waterway project will be final, due to the rocky character of the bottom.

Mr. SNELL. And there will be no flood-control difficulty to be met?

Mr. CULKIN. None.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. DUNN. Does the Federal Government pay this $100,000,000?

Mr. CULKIN. Absolutely. No one else pays it.

Mr. DUNN. I thought perhaps the States contributed to it.

Mr. CULKIN. I never heard of them making any contribution.

Mr. DUNN. I merely asked this as a matter of information.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. The contribution made by the States to flood control is considerable. The gentleman spoke as though a large part of the cost was due to navigation.

Mr. CULKIN. I have taken my figures from the records of the Rivers and Harbors Committee. If the gentleman differs with me, he must differ; I am sorry, but I have not time to enter into a discussion at this time. The gentleman can produce the correct figures if mine are erroneous.

Mr. BUSBY. I have no criticism to make of the gentleman. I was just trying to make the gentleman's statement plain.

Mr. CULKIN. You will recall that our share of new money for the St. Lawrence is $252,000,000, and out of that New York State pays $90,000,000 for the power. This leaves a net disbursement to the United States for the St. Lawrence seaway of $162,000,000. This is hardly more than enough for maintenance for one year and a half on the vast Mississippi system. Let me say to the gentlemen from these regions who are opposing the St. Lawrence project that it is my purpose, as I know it is the purpose of certain other Members of the House, to oppose all future river improvements in the Mississippi River Valley unless they mend their ways. Already rumor is rife that there will be no rivers and harbors bill this year if the selfish lobbyists representing the Mississippi River Valley are successful in their efforts to murder this treaty in its bed. Let me say, too, in passing, that the tonnage on their projects, under all kinds of artificial stimulation, is actually nominal in comparison with the disbursement the country is making.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] stated the other day on the floor here that this proposition was uneconomical; that there never had been a proper survey of the possibilities of this route. Let me briefly give you a history of the surveys that have been made of this route.

In January 1920 the Governments of the United States and Canada referred the matter of the improvement of the St. Lawrence for ocean navigation, with the development of water power incident thereto, to the International Joint Commission with instructions to report on its feasibility and practicability. The report of the General Board of Engineers, dated December 21, 1921, recommended a treaty for a plan of improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Ontario, and the report found, in substance, that the plan was desirable and feasible and would advance the common interests of both peoples.

In 1924 President Coolidge appointed a national committee of nine members, designated as the St. Lawrence Commission of the United States, with former President Hoover, who was then Secretary of Commerce, as chairman. This committee recommended the appointment of a general board of engineers representing the two countries. The committee was as follows: The late Maj. Gen. Edwin Jadwin, Col. William Kelly, and Brig. Gen. George B. Pillsbury.

After 2½ years' study and investigation this Joint Board of Engineers submitted its report to President Coolidge. This was on December 27, 1926. The committee stated that it is its opinion that the construction of a shipway from the Great Lakes to the sea was imperative "both for the relief and for the future development of the vast area in the interior of the continent."

Subsequent to this diplomatic negotiations were entered into, of which the treaty now pending in the Senate was the outcome.

NORTHEAST ATTITUDE

One of the strongest reports recommending the St. Lawrence seaway came from the New England-St. Lawrence Waterway Committee, composed of political leaders, leading engineers, and publicists from seven New England States. This group found that the opening of such a waterway would be beneficial rather than detrimental, because it opens to New England industries a new and cheap transportation artery; because it results in the saving of cuts in food supplies; because it has no possible adverse effect on the railroads. This committee finally placed itself definitely on record for the consummation of the treaty with Canada and urged upon all New England local and national representatives the desirability of their full cooperation in every reasonable manner to bring this about. I perhaps should add that since that time, under the urge of misleading propaganda, and principally because they believe that national economy will be served, the New England viewpoint has changed somewhat.

GRANGE ENDORSEMENT

The National Grange has made the St. Lawrence seaway the subject of a special study for many years. They have endorsed the treaty, stating that the route provides cheap transportation and links a great economic area with the markets of the world. It also suggests that the opportunity for rural electrification through the development of the St. Lawrence power is a matter of vital concern and interest to Grange members in the Northeast.

THE WATERS OF LAKE MICHIGAN

The claim is made that we are surrendering jurisdiction of Lake Michigan to the Canadian authorities. This, of course, is extremely ridiculous, for in the year 1842, in the Webster-Ashburton treaty, and coming down to the treaty of 1909, there has been a gradual extension of the equal principles of navigation on the Great Lakes and on the St. Lawrence system. The fact is that for half a century in certain places in the St. Lawrence and in the Detroit River these treaties and arrangements provide that navigation shall not be interfered with because of artificial arrangements of boundaries.

In 1871 Canada agreed with us that the navigation of the St. Lawrence from the sea to the international boundary should remain forever open for the purpose of commerce to the citizens of the United States.

In 1909 our country and Canada agreed that the navigation of all navigable boundary waters, including rivers and lakes, should forever continue free and open for the purpose of commerce to the inhabitants and to ships, vessels, and boats of both countries equally. Since that time we have enjoyed the free and unrestricted use of all Canadian canals, including the present St. Lawrence and the Welland.

Canada, on the other hand, has today an equal right to the use and enjoyment of our canals and waters. So that this treaty contains nothing new or pernicious. It is simply a consummation of the desires of both peoples. Its purpose is to further the material and cultural advancement of America and Canada.

THE COST OF THE WATERWAY

In their selfish desire to defeat this national project in the interests of their own localities the obstructionists assert that the cost of this waterway will greatly exceed the estimates of the engineers. Let me say a word about the engineers. The statement was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], that in the making of this treaty the United States engineers had sold out the United States. This is an outrageous and slanderous statement. But it was made in the heat of debate. The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] can make amends by apologizing to the engineers. In justice to himself and his home city of Buffalo, for which the engineers have done so much he can do no less. However, this unfortunate statement justifies a reference to the part the Army engineers have played in the making of America.

The efficiency and devotion of this group to the cause of America is, in large part, the basis of our national development. The future engineers were the intellectual leaders at West Point. Under the stress and discipline of that system they were the dominating mental and physical types, and as such were selected for the engineering service. Originally the engineers pioneered the West, built railroads, bridges, and performed other notable service in peace time. It is, of course, a combatant branch of the United States Army in times of war. One who knows them well has written of them:

Our Government requires the services of engineers who combine high professional qualifications in the above lines with esprit, personal probity, and complete freedom from political influences which the officer possesses.

The Nation has expended hundreds of millions of dollars for pioneering purposes, for the improvement of rivers and harbors, and for flood control. This work has been highly technical in character, requiring the exercise of the highest engineering skill. It has all been accomplished successfully, and the Nation, which hears little of this group of technicians, has reaped incalculable economic benefits from their work. It is interesting to note that while all the millions of dollars appropriated for these purposes, running beyond the billion mark, has been expended under the direction of the engineers there has been but one case of peculation in 110 years of this service. The engineers are the real field marshals of the public domain. They combine extraordinary industry and power of research with the highest order of intellect. Through my services on the Rivers and Harbors Committee I have been brought in contact with this group of remarkable public servants and have been amazed by the breadth and clarity of their findings on all questions concerning waterways and economics.

A reading of the testimony of the engineers given before the Senate subcommittee that conducted the hearings on this treaty will convince even the most skeptical that the costs of this project are in hand and are accurately estimated. That distinguished and beloved soldier, General Pillsbury, testifying before the committee in regard to the costs of America's share of this improvement, stated at page 324 of the hearings:

I have examined them (the expenses) generally and am absolutely convinced of their complete sufficiency, even if we return to more normal conditions.

The prices were estimated as of the 1926 period when costs were high.

The present Chief of Engineers, who is a world figure as engineer and an international authority in the field of waterways, navigation, and flood control, gives similar testimony on this point. General Markham, in common with General Pillsbury, studied the question of the St. Lawrence at close range for many years. He was a member of the American Section of the Joint Board of Engineers. He states, at page 347 of the hearings, as follows:

As the matter stands today I regard the estimates as being very greatly in excess of what will be the likely cost of that improvement, if undertaken during the period of conditions such as obtained today or at anywhere moderately up the incline; if, in fact, we will return with the construction period toward the 1926 prices.

The fiction persists that we will pay a greater portion of this construction than is our due share and that American construction is done with Canadian labor and Canadian materials. This is simply false, irresponsible, and founded on baseless propaganda. I will not worry you with the details of this, but suggest to the Members of the House that they read the testimony of Assistant Secretary of State J. G. Rogers, who negotiated the treaty. It commences at page 295 of the hearings. That portion of the evidence relating to the cost apportionment commences at page 281 of the hearings. We have reason to be proud of the achievement of this highly skilled and splendidly equipped diplomat for his part in negotiating this treaty. The naked fact is that the American portion of this canal will be built by American labor and American material. The Canadian end of it will be done by our Canadian neighbors. The treaty mirrors on both sides international good will and international accommodation. The attempt to create international ill will in connection with this discussion and to twist the lion's tail in an attempt to befog the issues, is unfair and irrelevant. It is drawing the traditional red herring across the trail that leads to international good will and the material and cultural advancement of two great Nations.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE POWER

The power development in the international section will amount to 2,500,000 horsepower. The history of the struggle for the control of this power is a romantic chapter in the history of the State of New York. For years the great power interests of the eastern seaboard have endeavored by every card in the deck to obtain control of this the last of our great national resources in the northeast.

Mr. Delos Cosgrove, vice chairman of the New York State Power Authority, stated in a speech at St. Paul, Minn., on January 12 in the present year:

The enormous reservoir of the Great Lakes, which serves the people of this region as a great highway of water-borne commerce, performs an equally important service for New York's power resources in that it equalizes the flow of the river and gives it unparallel uniformity of discharge. The river has no floods and no season of drought. The usual range between high- and low-water marks is but a few feet.

Forty years ago an act of the Legislature of New York State gave the right to a private company to divert water for power from the St. Lawrence River at Messena. Thereafter the Aluminum Co. of America secured control of this property. Later, and in 1907, another private company secured legislation to permit it to develop the resources of the river at a minimum rental to the State of $25,000 per year. This legislation was declared unconstitutional and the law was later repealed.

When Chief Justice Charles E. Hughes was Governor of the State he recommended that the State's water power "should not be surrendered to private interests, but should be preserved and held for the benefit of the people."

In 1926 Gov. Alfred E. Smith was in the field as a champion of the people's rights. He stopped the attempt to turn this power over to private interests. When President Roosevelt became Governor in 1929 he brought about the creation of a public agency to assume "entire control over these power resources and to retain them as the inalienable possession of all the people and to develop them and dispose of the power in the public interest."

Thereafter, and in President Roosevelt's administration as Governor, the Power Authority Act was passed unanimously by both the Senate and Assembly of New York State. Since that time the power authorities of New York have collaborated with the Federal Government, and by agreement with the engineers representing the Government have stipulated the sum of $90,000,000 as New York State's share in the construction expense. In consideration of this, the Federal Government concedes the title in New York State provided it is to be used as a public resource for the public benefit.

In the last session of Congress the House passed House Joint Resolution 157, which protects and safeguards the rights of the people of the State of New York to the power in question. Congress by the adoption of that resolution admitted the title of the State of New York to this power. Nor was this admission obtained without consideration. New York State agreed to pay $90,000,000 as its share of the construction cost. It is refreshing to know that while New York State gets the benefit of this power, it pays this substantial share of the costs. I desire to call the attention of some of my Mississippi Valley friends to the fact that this is not a Federal hand-out. I suggest that it might be well for them on occasion to consider the proposition of doing likewise.

This development of these natural resources with its resulting 2,250,000 horsepower of electric energy one half of which will be available for distribution in New York State and in New England as well. It will bring relief from excessive and oppressive charges for domestic lighting on the farm and in the homes.

Never in the history of the Republic has a project been offered that was so fruitful of benefits to the whole country. This waterway will require 10 years for completion, during which time the normal growth of traffic in the Nation will far more than compensate for any diversion from the American railroads or American port facilities. It is thoroughly national in scope. It rises above the whims and littleness of locality.

The resulting benefits of the St. Lawrence waterway with its power development will confer very material blessings upon the people of the West and Middle West. It will be a great aid to the future development of America. It will permanently confirm the title of the people of the Northeast to this great national resource. It would be the crime of the ages to stop this development. The construction of this seaway with its resulting power will mean great things for the farmer and manufacturer of the Middle West. The leadership of both parties is for it. Its consummation will be in the interests of a real nationalism. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I am addressing myself to the subject "Federal building program."

On May 20 last year I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee during their hearings when the national industrial recovery bill was being discussed. My purpose in doing that was because $93,600,000 had been diverted from the Federal building funds to other channels. Under the $3,300,000,000 appropriation being made, $400,000,000 was earmarked for roads, and other sums were earmarked for various things, but no sum at all set aside for Federal buildings.

Accordingly I presented the following amendment to the committee:

> For the purpose of providing for emergency construction of Federal buildings, to provide sites, and to provide for Government buildings where the plans and specifications are now complete, ready to be offered for bids, for others the plans and specifications which are partially completed.
> Also to provide for Federal building projects which were included in the original building program and in the Emergency Relief Act, the President is hereby authorized to set up for the continuance of Federal construction the sum of not less than $600,000,000 and not to exceed $700,000,000 in aggregate.

At this hearing I was supported, among others, by the American Federation of Labor through M. J. McDonough, president of the building-trades department, in which he said he represented a membership of 1,500,000 men and that their unemployment was the greatest, he believed, of any group of people in the United States. Later I was informed that $150,000,000 would be set aside, which amount would be augmented later. For months there was apparently no activity whatever in the building trades. In late September, on a visit to Washington, I found that a very few contracts for Federal buildings had been let since the 4th of March—approximately eight in all. I found that many Congressmen were dissatisfied with that part of the recovery program. On October 10 I released letters to all the Congressmen, Senators, Governors, material men, the American Federation of Labor and its affiliates, railroads, and others. In this letter I pointed out certain conditions that were existing in the building trades. A few of them were as follows: Construction work is more needed today than at any other time in our history. It is authoritatively stated that 1,500,000 laborers in the building trades are unemployed. In 1929, 1 out of every 10 persons was gainfully employed in construction work; $7,000,000,000 was paid to 4,500,000 people. Of this number 2,500,000 were directly employed in the work of construction. The remainder were employed in professions and industries dependent for their markets on the requirements of construction. In 1929 one out of every five carloads of freight moved consisted of construction materials in raw or finished form. Five percent of all coal mined was consumed to produce these materials. One out of every ten employed in the manufacturing was dependent on the demand for construction materials and appliances. These materials were produced in one fourth of the mills and factories of the country. Eight percent of the wholesale dealers were completely occupied with the distribution of these products.

Today construction activity is spreading at less than 10 percent of the 1929 total or about 15 percent of the total, which is generally accepted as normal. It is universally recognized that the Government should own its own buildings wherever possible. If these are built on substantial lines for utility purposes, it will not only be good, sound business, but will also be the means of carrying out the building feature of the public-works program. This will not only aid the unemployed who are in distress in the construction industry, but will be everlasting monuments to the Government for money well spent.

I received a tremendous response. Hundreds of letters poured in from all over the country, commending and complimenting my activity on this. Many letters were sent to me addressed to the Hon. Mr. Ickes and Mr. Douglas. Few, if any, who wrote me criticized my action. I secured a hearing with Mr. Ickes for Saturday, October 28. I was accompanied by the following Congressmen: DOUGHTON, GREENWOOD, JENCKES, DIES, and CROSS, and also by representatives from the American Federation of Labor, by representatives of the Association of General Contractors, Producers' Council, and American Institute of Architects.

Mr. Ickes informed me that he would have a conference with the President on the matter early the next week, which conference was had. Following that, within a short time, I received a report that 237 of the smaller buildings had been recommended totaling approximately $16,000,000. Others have been added to the program, which up to January 1 totaled 439 scattered throughout the United States, totaling $59,000,000. The following projects are already in the program for Indiana: Plymouth, $44,000; Hartford City, $63,800; Sullivan, $46,800; Vincennes, $140,377; Angola, $57,800; Lawrenceburg, $55,200; and others, including Indianapolis, Ind., are in the program which I am working on to get them allocated at the earliest possible date.

This is fine as far as it goes. I appreciate the tremendous support I have been given in this by many Members of Congress, as well as Senators, Governors, and others, but the program should be tremendously augmented, and I appeal to the Membership of the House to urge in the next outlay of money for relief and public works that a generous amount be earmarked for Federal buildings.

You will understand that I am not criticizing the general program of the President. I am backing him and believe in his general program. The program I am recommending would augment what is already being done. Employment is needed if we are to have recovery. This employment will give something worth while for our money.

It is sometimes said that public buildings do not help materially and that they only go to certain locations. For your information I give some figures which I have. The money from three new buildings in the city of Washington—the Department of Labor Building, the Interstate Commerce Commission Building, and Post Office Buildings—totaling $21,000,000 has gone into 27 States besides the District of Columbia. I am setting this out here in the RECORD in complete form:

Alabama	$30,000
Arkansas	160,000
California	500,000
Connecticut	600,000
Delaware	40,000
Georgia	100,000
Illinois	400,000
Indiana	2,500,000
Maryland	850,000
Maine	50,000
Massachusetts	300,000
Michigan	1,100,000
Minnesota	600,000
Missouri	200,000
New Hampshire	400,000
New Jersey	890,000
New York	1,250,000
North Carolina	100,000
Ohio	850,000
Oregon	50,000
Pennsylvania	2,500,000
South Dakota	10,000
Tennessee	650,000
Vermont	300,000
Virginia	1,000,000
West Virginia	170,000
Wisconsin	400,000
Transportation	2,000,000
District of Columbia	3,000,000
Total	21,000,000

Obviously this means the employment of thousands of people all over the country.

It is suggested by some that this building program would not create much work, and for the reasons given that you would go to the shelf, to the brickyard, to the factory or mill for the materials going into the building, and for that reason the amount of labor would be less, all of which is only a part statement of fact. While that is true in the last analysis, it is only partly true because all of these things and other sources of origin; and when you take from the shelf or mill, that requires the shopkeeper and the mill-owner to go back to his source of supply and on and on until when you pass all of the labor you get out to the clay bank, to the mine, the quarry, the forest, and perhaps with a penny's worth of clay you have a dollar's worth of tile in the wall of the building, and so on through the process of materials.

Naturally, I am interested personally. I hail from a district which owns immense stores of building material, but I have not put this work and this program on a narrow, biased basis. I have looked at it from a national standpoint, from an industrial-recovery standpoint, having left out all mention of any certain material, and in my work to date have contacted all major material people in the country. I have in my district the Indiana limestone quarries and mills, which produce a fine, lasting, beautiful building material, but mention of that industry has not entered into the picture. Our material is of such outstanding quality and found in such generous amounts and our people operate on such large scales that we are able to meet any reasonable competition and would hope to get our fair, just share of the business if the program gets under way. I have tried to help in this program every Congressman in the United States by securing these buildings and help the people in every district in the United States and aid the general recovery plan. I am for and believe in all of the programs of relief, public works, civil works, money donated for charitable purposes. I supported the bills to give wheat and cotton for relief purposes, but after all much of that money, when it is spent, is gone. This program will answer the same purposes; and when the buildings are completed, they will be as lasting monuments to money well spent.

This should not be handled nor looked at as logrolling. It should be on the basis of a good, sound business proposition. It also occurs to me that this should be placed back with the Treasury Department, where it formerly was, to be handled by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, with certain amounts of funds earmarked and budgeted, the same as we do in other departments of the Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWE. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. How much of that $21,000,000 went to the State of Tennessee?

Mr. CROWE. I am not sure, but I will look at this list. There were 27 States involved. The gentleman may secure this information from the RECORD. Tennessee, $650,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and Members of Congress, no doubt every Member in Congress has received letters since he came here this year from people in his district telling him they are in need of employment or in need of food, shelter, and clothing. It is an absolute fact that in every congressional district of the United States there are men and women who are physically and mentally able to work, but cannot obtain jobs. It is also a fact that these people who want to work and cannot get work have a difficult task in securing relief from the various welfare agencies.

Mr. Chairman, something must be done for those who are unable to obtain work. It is true there are men and women who at one time had money in the bank, but because of the bank failing they have not any funds to purchase the necessities of life. I know in my district utility companies have shut off the water, gas, and electric power in the homes of those who, through no fault of their own, are unable to pay their bills. When I was over at the White House last spring talking to our good President, I asked him, "Can we not do something in a Federal way to prevent utility companies from turning off the water, gas, and light in the homes of unemployed people because they are unable to pay their bills?" The President answered by saying that he agreed with me that it was unfortunate, but, unfortunately, we could not pass any Federal legislation, because it would be an infringement upon State rights.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that if we have a Constitution that is going to prevent Federal legislation being enacted to prevent utility companies from depriving human beings of the necessities of life, it is time we changed our Constitution. I maintain that the Constitution should be subservient to man and not man subservient to the Constitution.

Many of these unfortunates in my district and your district are veterans of the last war and veterans of the Spanish-American War, and the widows of veterans and the dependents of veterans who cannot get work no matter how hard they try.

So what are we going to do? We must do something. The United States has in its possession more foodstuffs and other necessities than it can actually use.

So, let us at this session of Congress, before we adjourn, make it possible that every man and woman who is able to work and cannot get to work shall at least be provided with the necessities of life and not be compelled to get on their knees and ask some would-be charitable agency for food. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and in connection therewith to put in two or three short tables showing the total of the actual amounts available to the Interior Department under this bill, and the allotments that have been made to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have felt that the Congress and the people ought to know the truth about the situation of these appropriation bills and that it was my duty to call to the attention of the House such matters as come before it from time to time in these appropriation bills as we go along.

It is true that the appropriations for the entire Department for 1934 were $50,479,271.61, but along last June, when we passed the bill known as the "fourth deficiency bill", we turned over to the Executive the right to allot $3,300,000,000 just about as he pleased; we thereby abdicated the power of appropriation to that extent.

It is interesting to note that always heretofore we have carried in our appropriation bills just what we were going to expect to spend in the fiscal year that we were approaching. We provided for the money at this time that was expected to be used in the fiscal year 1935.

A year ago we provided for the money expected to be used in 1934. Let me say to you that there has already been allotted to the Interior Department out of the $3,300,000,000 fund to be spent in the fiscal year 1935, $111,353,887.

Let me say that there has been allotted to the Interior Department for the fiscal year 1936 out of that fund, practically 2 years in advance of when it normally would be appropriated, the sum of $27,675,000.

For the fiscal year 1934 there was allocated to the Interior Department the sum of $58,432,924.

Actual amounts available to the Interior Department for the respective years, including both allotments and appropriations

	1934	1935	1936
Appropriation	$50,479,271.67	$31,209,456
Allotment	58,432,924.00	111,353,887	$27,675,000
Total	108,912,195.67	142,563,343

So that the fund available to the Interior Department for 1934 amounts to $108,912,195; for 1935, notwithstanding the fact that the Budget and its committee have reduced the appropriation to $31,209,456, the allotments that have been already made, without taking into consideration any that may be made in the future, make available for the Interior Department in 1935 the enormous total of $142,563,343, an increase of the amount available for 1934 of $34,000,000, an increase over the amount available for similar activities in prior years of practically $100,000,000.

Now, these funds have been allocated for all sorts of things. All conceivable roads and trails in national parks have been provided for that might be built.

There has been allocated for national parks $29,610,000.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Does not that apply to all the Government departments with reference to extra appropriations?

Mr. TABER. It does. I think I ought to call the attention of the House, as long as the gentleman has mentioned it, to the fact that there appears down to November 1933 an allotment from the P.W.A. and the C.W.A. funds in the Budget on pages 80A and 81A.

Mr. EVANS. In the various Government appropriation bills there will be reflected the money expended in those departments.

Mr. TABER. No. In this case let me say the amount appropriated is just about 22 percent of the total available.

Mr. EVANS. And that applies to all departments.

Mr. TABER. It does; and instead of reductions under the Budget, we are having tremendous increases, and these funds are available for all sorts of things that are generally carried in the Budget, and have been for years.

Mr. BOLTON. Are these allotments by the P.W.A. subject to any recommendations from the various bureaus under which they are administered, or are they at the request or desire of the P.W.A. Administrator himself?

Mr. TABER. It is entirely the Administrator of the P.W.A. himself, without any control on the part of the Budget.

Mr. BOLTON. Does the gentleman know whether that was considered when the original Public Works Act was approved by the Congress? Was it not the understanding at that time that those expenditures were more or less to be in line with the actions of the Congress in the past?

Mr. TABER. It was supposed to be, but it has not been that way. For instance, Congress has repeatedly refused to authorize an appropriation for the development of the Columbia River Basin project in Washington. Sixty-three million dollars have been allotted to the Interior Department for a power project there, and that is possible of being turned into an irrigation project, to make available for cultivation 1,000,000 acres of land on which to raise a little more foodstuff for us to exercise control over. The Casper-Alcova project in Wyoming has had allocated to it, if I remember correctly, something in the neighborhood of $12,000,000 for a power plant. This power project will cost, in all, $22,000,000 in Wyoming, which is supposed to yield some 51,200 horsepower. The project for the Columbia River Basin proposition is expected to yield 700,000 horsepower, one of the largest projects of that kind in the world.

There have also been allocated to different items in the reclamation work something like $15,000,000 for small projects, which will provide for anywhere from 50 acres up to 10,000 and 20,000 and 100,000 acres, so that all reclamation work that anybody could possibly dream of has been already provided for. I do not believe it is going to be possible to think of any more reclamation projects than those already provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, on January 4, 1934, I introduced a bill (H.R. 6373) which is entitled "A bill to relieve unemployment and aid agriculture."

When the Public Works program started, we had twelve and a half million people out of work and having to receive aid from the Government or from some charitable institution. The Public Works program has put to work about 4,000,000 people, leaving about eight and a half million unemployed. It will be a matter of impossibility for the Government to furnish employment for all of these people, and they must be cared for in some way, and it demands the very best thought that we can command to adjust this situation and relieve these conditions. The many things that have given employment in the past will not give the same number employment in the future, regardless of whatever conditions might be brought about.

Railroad building has been practically completed in the United States, and many men who have been given employment in railroad work are now out of work. The building of highways, which has given much employment in the past, will never give the same amount of employment in the future. Within the next 4 or 5 years the building of our levee and drainage districts will have been completed, and many people that have been engaged in that kind of work will be out of employment.

The machine age is here, and machines are now being used which destroy the man power of the country and leaves many men out of employment. We could go on enumerating many other things that have given employment heretofore that cannot be expected to continue.

There are many other persons who have never been trained in any skilled work, that have relied on day labor for a living, that are now out of employment and cannot get permanent employment. There are many persons who were trained in early life in agricultural pursuits that have left the farm and gone to the city and are now stranded, unable to get back on the farm, where they could make a living for themselves.

My bill seeks to reach many of those persons and give them a chance in life to again make their own support which they so much desire to do.

The first section of the bill provides that all land now owned or may hereafter be acquired by purchase or otherwise by the United States that is suitable for agriculture is hereby made subject to homestead under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The United States Government owns many thousands of acres of land that is of no practical value to the United States Government that could be used to help solve this question of unemployment.

Section 2 of the bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to purchase lands for carrying out this act, suitable for agricultural purposes. The United States Government is constantly selling off some of its lands and the timber therefrom and accumulates quite a sum of money from this source. This money could be utilized in buying other lands suitable for agricultural purposes for the unemployed.

Section 3 of the bill provides that all persons who have had previous experience in farming and all persons who desire to engage permanently in farming, and who are out of employment, may make application to the Secretary of Agriculture to homestead a tract of land not exceeding 40 acres.

Section 4 of the bill provides that the cost of homesteading said lands shall be 50 cents per acre. That is about the actual cost of the homestead proceedings which, in fact, donates the land to the person who will enter upon it, cultivate, and make a home there.

Section 5 provides that after any of said land has been homesteaded then the person holding said land so homesteaded may apply to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation for a loan not exceeding $10 per acre on said land for the purpose of being used solely and exclusively for building said homestead.

There are many cases that have come under my personal observation where persons having 5 or 6 in the family and who have had experience in raising their own foods that are now wholly unable to get back on the farm. This plan would give them 40 acres of land and entitle them to a loan for the building of a home in the sum of $400.

The loan would be given for a period of 15 years at 4-percent interest, and both the interest and principal guaranteed by the Government. This would guarantee that they could enter upon the land, build a home in which they could live, and could very soon have the lands cleared and cultivated, which would be a means of sustaining the entire family.

Section 6 of the bill provides that Home Owners' Loan Corporation is hereby authorized to issue to any person so applying for a loan on his homestead a bond of said Corporation of the same kind now being used by it and bearing interest at the same rate, and to run the same length of time and on the same terms of the bonds now being issued by it. Under the terms of that loan the first 3 years the interest only is required to be paid, and no part of the principal.

Under the provisions of that act the person living on this tract of land would only be out the interest, which would be $16 per year for the first 3 years, which would give him an ample opportunity of clearing, fencing, and building a little home upon the land.

Section 7 reads as follows:

> The United States Government hereby guarantees the payment of both principal and interest on the bonds so issued by said Home Owners' Loan Corporation for the purpose of improving homesteads.

Section 8 of the bill provides that the Home Owners' Loan Corporation retains its lien on the land for the loan, as it now does on other homes, until the full amount is paid out. Under this plan the Government could never lose a penny. Not only that, it would put thousands of acres of land into use and on the tax books as taxable property, whereas now it is free from taxation, and the States or counties in which it is located get nothing as a return from it.

I can see no reason why a plan of this kind, if adopted and carried out to its fullest extent, would not soon relieve the unemployed situation in a way that no other plan now being used can accomplish.

In the public works bill, which passed the last Congress, it carried an appropriation of $25,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out this idea, but with no perfect plan of accomplishing the purpose. If that money were used in the manner suggested in this bill, it would be ample to furnish thousands with homes that are now homeless and are wholly dependent on the help they receive from the plan now being carried on by the Government.

I hope that favorable consideration will be given to this bill and that it will be passed during this session of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I have come before you in the few minutes allotted me to speak a word in behalf of the school children of the United States. The C.W.A. and the P.W.A., and other relief agencies, are spending millions to help the people of our country, and I feel that too little attention has been paid by the Congress to the problems that are confronting the public-school system of the United States. In a report that was recently issued by the Department of Education, it is stated that 770 schools are now closed with no provision for 175,146 children; that 1,540 schools will have terms of 3 months or less; that 10,982 schools will have terms of 3 to 6 months; that the city schools employ 18,000 fewer teachers now than in 1930, and that city school budgets average 20-percent reduction since 1930; that schools now operate on $368,000,000 less than in 1930. I call these matters to your attention so that when bills and matters concerning the public-school system come before you for your consideration, you will give them sympathetic attention.

Rural schools are closing all over my State for lack of funds. This condition is not confined to my State alone, but it is general all over the country. In yesterday's news I noticed that a number of schools are closing in Alabama and in Pennsylvania. It is no longer a local problem—it is national in scope.

While we are being generous with physical relief, we should not neglect the spiritual and mental. While we are coming to the relief of industry we should not neglect the childhood and youth of our country. While we are putting millions on the pay rolls we should not neglect the teachers of our land. It is true that some needy and destitute teachers are being provided with teaching positions with salaries on a lower basis than common labor. Nothing has been done to aid school systems as such.

When we are spending millions of dollars for the relief of banks; when we are spending millions of dollars for the relief of railroads; when we are spending millions of dollars in constructing concrete roads and other building projects, I feel that our Government should not neglect the school children of our country in whose control in a few short years will be placed the destiny of our country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, in these few minutes I rise to say a few words on the selection of the new President in Cuba, Col. Carlos Mendieta, a man whom I have had the good fortune to know personally and for whom I have the highest regard. For many years we have had all kinds of difficulties in Cuba, either as a result of a ruthless military dictatorship such as existed under Machado or an equally cruel but irresponsible Government of the left supported by radical armed students, and in neither case by Cuban public opinion. The Cuban people have selected for the office of Provisional President an honorable, upright, able, and patriotic Cuban who fought in the Spanish War along with our own soldiers, and who represents the best interests and welfare of the Cuban people. I predict that he will restore representative government and bring back peace, tranquillity, and prosperity to that country which has been going through hell for the last 3 or 4 years.

I only rose to ask that the State Department look up the record of Colonel Mendieta, who is a friend of the United States and who is beloved by the Cuban people as a great patriot and supported by almost all of the party factions. The State Department should proceed without delay to recognize the existing Cuban Government and help to stabilize conditions in Cuba and do our part to help restore peace and prosperity in that country bordering upon our Nation. I hope, as soon as we recognize Colonel Mendieta as President, we will proceed to do away with the Platt amendment, which guarantees to the Cuban people, on behalf of the United States Government, a government that will maintain life, property, and individual liberty. We have failed to keep our obligations to the Cuban people for the past 5 years; and if the obligations of the Platt amendment mean nothing, why not repeal it? No Member of Congress advocated armed intervention, in spite of the fact that we had a moral obligation, and even an absolute treaty duty, to intervene when the Cuban Government fails to safeguard life, property, and individual liberty. In view of the fact that the President of the United States has only recently stated that we were opposed to using armed force or military aggression, particularly against South American nations, I plead for two things: First, for the immediate recognition of Colonel Mendieta as President of Cuba, in order to restore stability, peace, and prosperity there; and, secondly, the repeal of the Platt amendment, or that part of it which guarantees a government adequate to maintain life, property, and individual liberty. I am serving notice that I propose, within the next few days, to introduce a resolution, which I assume will be sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, repealing the Platt amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MARLAND].

Mr. MARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of this Committee for a few moments to an item in this appropriation bill. There are several thousand full-blood Indian children in Oklahoma whose parents own allotments of good farming land of from 80 acres to as high as 700 acres. Those children need education in agricultural science more than they need education of any other type. They will eventually be the owners of this land, and with agricultural education they will become independent, self-supporting citizens.

The Chilocco Indian School, located in Oklahoma, is the best Indian agricultural school in the United States. It has at present a capacity for 950 students. Its present enrollment is 850. The appropriation carried in this bill provides for only 650 children for the next year. Two hundred children now attending that school will be forced to discontinue their attendance by reason of failure to appropriate sufficient funds. It is my hope that Congress will see the great value of this school for the training of our Indian children, and at the earliest possible time will increase the appropriation for this school. An addition of less than $100,000 to the appropriation provided in this bill would take care of 300 additional students. Chilocco has approximately 8,000 acres of wonderfully fertile land, splendid buildings, and has equipment for 950 students, yet only 650 are taken care of by the appropriation provided in this measure.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to read certain extracts from a newspaper article and from communications addressed to myself from various constituents.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon a local paper carried a dispatch which I hope received attention of all the Members of the House and of the Senate. For those who did not see it, I would like to read a short extract:

> Congress soon will be asked by President Roosevelt for the $1,166,000,000 additional funds to complete this year's emergency Budget, from which the money will be used to continue the Civil Works Administration and other relief agencies through the spring.
> Administration leaders at the Capitol have shown no concern over the possibility of getting these funds. The appropriation bills already have started on their course and this emergency sum will follow in due time.

That bears out what repeated inquiries on my part during the past 2 weeks have proven true. The Appropriations Committee is not concerned with this sum for the simple reason, so they state, that no Member of Congress has appeared before them and asked for the sum, or has shown any interest. They cannot be blamed. Instead, therefore, of asking for a hearing before the subcommittee of the full Appropriations Committee, I have undertaken to use this means of placing certain material and data in the RECORD, and then bringing it to the attention of the full membership of the Committee on Appropriations and supplementing that by a request for an appearance before the proper subcommittee at their convenience, and in the very near future. For time is short.

To the Membership of the House I want to suggest that in the States where similar conditions exist to those I am going to describe, they also present their data before the Committee on Appropriations at the earliest possible moment, because this situation is truly urgent.

Permit me to read you a telegram from the executive secretary of our Public Works and Civil Works Administration in the State of Minnesota, L. P. Zimmerman. It is truly alarming, and I can vouch for the truth of it, because personal surveys conducted in the month of December together with Senator SHIPSTEAD showed these situations in their formation:

> Unofficial report states C.W.A. fund will be exhausted February 1. Need for immediate steps for continuance of C.W.A. program imperative. Riots and serious troubles imminent in central western Minnesota and other sections of drought area. Congress should act at once and rally to support of needy.

I might say that the situation is more acute out there because that is in a drought area, where they have actual famine and complete lack of food and feed for livestock, as well as for people, with no available source of income as a result of that drought. That situation is being in part relieved by the furnishing of food, feed, and clothing, in addition to the further aid through C.W.A. employment.

A telegram from the mayor of Duluth makes the same plea:

> Under constantly improving organization C.W.A. now working effectively and receiving public commendation. To avoid serious consequences under our climatic conditions C.W.A. should be continued during the winter and early spring months and as to all accepted projects until same are completed. This I regard as very important.

I have a similar communication from the mayor of Minneapolis, reading as follows:

> MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., January 13.
> Hon. PAUL KVALE,
> Minnesota Representative:
>
> I am advised C.W.A. funds will be exhausted early February. Imperative more money be provided for these projects. This work has given jobs in Minneapolis alone to 13,000 men, and service projects have given work to 3,000 additional men. Sixty-five hundred families have been taken off Minneapolis relief rolls since these projects got under way, saving city $140,000 monthly. Serious social problems will result if C.W.A. work halted February. Private industry in city cannot possibly provide work for those now receiving regular wages on C.W.A. projects. Also serious problems will result if these people have to be put back on city relief. Please use every effort within your power to obtain more C.W.A. funds and extend work projects at least until first of May.
> Mayor A. G. BAINBRIDGE.

I read now a copy of a telegram addressed to the President by the mayor of Rochester, Minn:

> ROCHESTER, MINN., January 15, 1934.
> FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
> The White House, Washington, D.C.
> DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am informed from several sources that the funds which are providing employment under the C.W.A. and P.W.A. programs probably will be exhausted in the first week in February, and that so far neither Congress nor yourself have taken any definite steps to continue the Federal public-employment programs. I also am informed that in many places quotas already are being cut and the work schedules staggered.
> Olmsted County, with 35,000 population, has 2,400 male workers registered and 400 female workers. We actually have at work under the C.W.A. appropriation approximately 900 men and 200 women. Under the P.W.A. program we soon will have 200 men working; and the city of Rochester will be spending $400,000 in the next 12 months on public improvements without State or Federal aid. Of this sum, $55,000 has already been awarded in contracts, but the balance of the work will not be started until June 1.

Olmsted County is now spending $10,000 a month for poor relief, and this after 50 percent of the men working on C.W.A. projects were taken off the county relief rolls.

The C.W.A. program will have to be carried on until June 1 to prevent acute distress in Olmsted County. And in this community there is no possibility at the present time of industry absorbing these people and there will be no possibility until June, when our canning factory opens and, with better prices, agriculture may provide extra employment.

It is absolutely necessary that the C.W.A. and P.W.A. be continued without let-up. The people now employed on these programs have no other means of subsistence and the city and county cannot care for them. The county sold $100,000 bonds for poor relief last summer, in addition to levying heavy taxes for the same purpose, but these funds are now exhausted. In the name of humanity, to prevent wide-spread suffering among innocent persons, I respectfully urge you to take immediate steps to have Congress provide extra funds to carry on the C.W.A. and P.W.A. programs.

JULIUS REITER, Mayor.

These messages, and others, have been formally laid before the appropriate administrative offices and will be presented, with corroborating facts, to the subcommittee.

They are typical of a large volume of mail and telegrams I am receiving. The burden of it all is a plea to continue these agencies in force. I shall present specific data and actual facts and evidence before the subcommittee; and I hope no more statements will be made regarding the lack of interest of Members of the House of Representatives in this grave problem after my colleagues get busy, organize, and present the material they must have in abundant surplus. Let us act now.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, Members of the Committee have presented favorable arguments for the St. Lawrence waterway project. I am heartily in accord with them, and especially do I endorse the statement made yesterday by the minority leader, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL]. We have other projects in the Northwest and in Minnesota of State and national importance: The Lac qui Parle, the New Ulm, and the Mendota projects, reservoirs on the Minnesota River; the Root, Zumbro, and Cannon River reservoir projects in southern and southeastern Minnesota; three reservoir projects, the St. Croix, the Nevers, and the Kettle River Rapids, on the St. Croix River; the Chisago Chain of Lakes, the Lake Minnetonka, and Minnehaha Creek projects; and others. These bodies of water are well known to Members of the House; many of you having summered at Lake Minnetonka.

My time being very limited I ask permission to insert certain information and data concerning these projects, because they are of National and State importance.

LAKE MINNETONKA AND MINNEHAHA CREEK

In the eastern central part of Minnesota, in Hennepin County, about 15 miles from the city of Minneapolis, is a lake with approximately 200 miles of shore line and an area of 22½ square miles. In 1928 this lake had an elevation of 930.1 feet above mean sea level. By November 18, 1933, the level had sunk to 924.8 feet. A number of years of abnormal rainfall would be required to restore the 5 feet of water to Lake Minnetonka, and bring back its former beauty. This information is from the report of Engineer Sven A. Norling, of the Minnesota Public Works Committee.

The total area of the Lake Minnetonka drainage basin, or watershed, according to Engineer Norling, is 129 square miles—a basin consisting of rolling country containing some marshy and swampy land and a large number of smaller lakes. All these smaller lakes, and this marshy, swampy land, composing about a third of the Minnetonka watershed, tend to prevent the flow of surplus water run-off into the lake. Before any water will flow into Lake Minnetonka, all these adjoining lakes and streams must be made to overflow, and this cannot be done until from 5 to 10 feet of water is added to them.

Many years of abundant rainfall would be necessary before nature could restore the wonderful beauty of famous Lake Minnetonka, and raise the land values of the surrounding country. There is no indication that the levels of this historic lake will be naturally restored.

CAUSES OF LOWERED LEVEL

Engineer Sven Norling reports that Lake Minnetonka has been steadily receding since April or May 1929, when the lake was sufficiently high to discharge a few inches of water over Grays Bay Dam, until now the water is almost 5 feet lower than the dam crest. He states that climatological conditions more than anything else account for the recent recessions of lake levels in Minnesota. Precipitation has for 5 years been below normal, and temperature above normal. Losses of water are also caused by transpiration from vegetation in shallow lake and dried-up lake bed areas. The condition is aggravated by the fact that many hundreds of homes and many villages pump water out of the lake for domestic supplies and lawn sprinkling. Hydraulic Engineers Adolph F. Meyer and Sven A. Norling, of Minneapolis, in recent reports state that the effect of such pumping would readily amount to lowering the lake from 2 to 2½ inches a year. Engineer Norling states that the loss of water by transpiration through the foliage of a heavy, swamp vegetation may be twice as large as that caused by evaporation from free-water surface. Since the lake is already 5 feet lower than normal, large areas of it have become swampy and marshy, and are covered with vegetative growth and pools of stagnant water. And since the lake is lower, the water is warmer and more subject to further evaporation.

At one time there was a flowing stream (Minnehaha Creek) from Lake Minnetonka to Minneapolis, where it dropped suddenly and formed the famous falls which inspired the poet Longfellow's Indian romance. Statues of Hiawatha and Minnehaha still stand at the head of the drop, but the rushing falls are no more. From a commercial standpoint, this means that the lowlands in the valley of Minnehaha Creek are now practically worthless.

The project proposed by Engineer Norling would involve several changes:

First. Rebuilding and relocating of the present Grays Bay Dam (on Lake Minnetonka), which is in poor condition. The new location would be at Wayzata Road crossing, and the dam would be provided with five steel gates on top of the concrete base, permitting storage and complete control of outflow of water from Lake Minnetonka.

Second. The installation of dams at seven different places, creating a chain of lakes which would transform the surrounding country into a valuable residential district close to Minneapolis, the largest population center of the Northwest.

Third. Transforming the swamps into lake areas, and in this way utilizing and storing water which would otherwise evaporate through the foliage of heavy swamp vegetation.

Fourth. Control of outflow to double the present flowage in Minnehaha Creek.

The section of Minnehaha Creek affected covers a distance of 9.3 miles. By the building of seven dams, water areas are proposed at the following elevations: 896, 907, 909, 913, 918, 924, and 930. The dam proposed at Minnetonka Mills (Dam No. 7) would be 930 feet above sea level, which is the normal elevation of Lake Minnetonka. Dam No. 7 would eliminate the present Grays Bay Dam—a combined dirt and plank dam, which is now in poor condition and allows leakage between the planks amounting to about 1,500 gallons per minute, in addition to seepage under the dam and at the sides of the dam. The elimination of Grays Bay Dam would bring Lake Minnetonka to Minnetonka Mills, 1.8 miles closer to the city of Minneapolis.

An area of 907.2 acres would be covered with water by the damming of Minnehaha Creek. However, the shore lines proposed would reduce the water area to 501.8 acres, and 405.4 acres would be reclaimed for agricultural, residential, and public-park purposes. Such transformation would naturally raise the value of the surrounding territory as well.

Gates are to be installed at the different dams, to control the water levels, and 4,900,000 cubic yards of material would be displaced by dredging to make a uniform depth of 12 feet. The water-storage area and the capacity above each dam have been determined by Engineer Norling.

Dam no.	Elevation	Water area	Shore line	Gallons
		Acres	Feet
1	896	51.1	34,500	200,000,000
2	907	41.9	18,200	164,000,000
3	909	115.4	28,000	455,000,000
4	913	52.1	19,500	204,000,000
5	918	16.0	5,800	63,000,000
6	924	28.6	9,100	112,000,000
7	930	196.7	34,300	770,000,000
	Total	501.8	150,300	1,968,000,000

Sections of land would be acquired for public parks and outdoor recreational purposes. As Mr. Norling states:

> The entire area within a mile and beyond on either side of the Creek Valley offers such an abundance of varying scenic beauty, which would be greatly enhanced by the execution of such a plan, that I have no hesitancy to state that the possibilities of developing the territory involved in this project and adjacent thereto into a lake park residential district are almost unsurpassed, and, if the investment is made, it is bound to bring the same usual manifold and happy returns which have followed similar undertakings within the limits of the city.

Mr. Norling doubtless refers to such projects as Lake Calhoun, Lake Nokomis, and Hiawatha Lake, which created three beautiful outdoor recreation centers for the city of Minneapolis. With the series of seven lakes extending many miles outside of Minneapolis, the city's outdoor recreational facilities will be expanded, the population will spread out from the congested traffic center to new homes constructed in the State's choicest residential district, within daily driving distance to the business district of Minneapolis.

Four different methods have been suggested for the raising of Lake Minnetonka and the restoration of Minnehaha Creek and Falls. First: The diversion of the Crow River, a short stream formed by the junction of a north and a south fork about 2 miles upstream from Rockford. The area drained by this river is in Stevens, Kandiyohi, Meeker, Renville, McLeod, Wright, and Hennepin Counties, between the basins of the Sauk River to the west, the Minnesota River to the south, and the Lake Minnetonka Drainage Basin to the east. (From report of Engineer Sven A. Norling.) This project would divert the South Fork of the Crow River, with a drainage area of from 1,200 to 1,300 square miles, or 10 times the drainage area of the Lake Minnetonka Basin. Engineer Norling states that had Lake Minnetonka been supplied with water from the overflow of the South Fork of the Crow River and the outlet of the lake been provided with proper dam control, the lake level today would have been at elevation 928.4, which is 3.6 feet higher than its present level.

Second. Pumping and piping of water from Mississippi River: It is estimated that with continuous pumping 1 foot could be added to the lake in 72 days, and it would take 1 year of continuous pumping to bring Minnetonka's level back to normal. A 60-inch pipe line carrying water at a velocity of 5 feet per second would be required.

Third. Pumping and piping of water from Minnesota River: The flow of water from the Minnesota River is not as large as from the Mississippi, but there are no riparian water-power interests to be interfered with.

Fourth. Artesian wells: Ramsey County, in Minnesota, has used this method and restored many of its lakes. Engineer Adolph F. Meyer states that wells should probably be relatively shallow and should be sunk into the drift and upper rock strata to the northwest and near the extreme westerly end of the lake. Both Meyer and Norling agree that this method of raising the Minnetonka level should be further investigated.

COST OF MINNETONKA PROJECT

Engineer Norling has estimated the cost for completion of the Minnetonka Lake raising and restoration of Minnehaha Creek project, as follows:

Minnetonka Lake level restoration project

Alternative 1. Crow River diversion project (diversion by gravity flow, no pumping needed)	$500,000
Alternative 2. Minnesota River—Minnetonka pipe line and pumping project	600,000
Current and operation cost per foot of water added to Minnetonka, $60,000.
Alternative 3. Mississippi River—Minnetonka pipe line and pumping project	1,200,000
Current and operation cost per foot of water added to Minnetonka, $40,000.
Alternative 4. Installation of artesian wells and pumping from same—twelve 24-inch wells at $20,000	240,000
Current and operation cost per foot of water added to Minnetonka, $25,000.
Project recommended based upon present investigations and surveys is Crow River diversion plan supplemented with 3 large-sized artesian wells at an estimated cost of	600,000

Minnehaha Creek Valley development project

4,900,000 cubic yards of dredging at 10 cents per yard	$490,000
7 dams at $20,000	140,000
500 acres right-of-way at $200	100,000
Overhead and contingencies	70,000
Total	800,000
Combined cost of Lake Minnetonka and Minnehaha Creek projects	1,400,000

SVEN A. NORLING, Consulting Engineer.

Preparatory to the Minnehaha Creek restoration project, C.W.A. funds have been utilized for lining the banks and sides of Minnehaha Creek mill-pond area, in Edina Village, just outside of Minneapolis. Already a part of this area has been flooded and a skating pond made.

In addition to this preparatory project, C.W.A. funds are being used to conduct a survey of the entire project. The survey will last about 2 months, at which time Federal funds should be appropriated to complete the project. Now is the time to complete the project, when millions of men are out of work and when land values are sinking with the lake levels. The people of Minneapolis and Minnesota are awakening to the possibilities that this worthy project holds forth, and I believe they will bring pressure to bear and see that the project is completed now that it has been started.

CHISAGO CHAIN OF LAKES

Another spot dear to the hearts of Minnesotans, and especially those who are familiar with the lake regions of Chisago County on the Wisconsin border and about 25 miles from the Twin Cities, is the Chisago chain of lakes, once one of the most beautiful spots in the State of Minnesota. The Chisago chain has about one half the water area of Lake Minnetonka. The residents of Chisago County have watched their beautiful chain of lakes recede to one half the size they were 15 years ago. The very existence of the lakes is threatened, and there may be no Chisago lakes a few years from now unless funds are forthcoming without delay to restore this beautiful lake body.

Engineer Norling's estimated cost is $320,000, and it is recommended by the engineers that water be diverted either from Sunrise River or from the St. Croix River. Visitors to the Chisago lakes region are shocked by the deplorable condition of the Chisago lakes, and from a commercial standpoint huge losses in tourist business are inevitable.

The people of Chisago County have formed a fine organization—the Chisago Lakes Association—for the purpose of bringing pressure to bear upon the proper authorities. There has been splendid cooperation among the citizens of that county and the surrounding localities, and excellent publicity has been given the project by the Chisago County press. A survey has been completed by Engineer Sven Norling, and the people of Chisago County are waiting for the necessary funds to be appropriated for this worthy project. Splendid community centers, such as Lindstrom, Chisago City, Center City, and many other communities now suffering from this drought will greatly prosper when the project is completed and tourists once more return to the beautiful Chisago chain of lakes.

LAKE TRAVERSE-BOISE DE SIOUX PROJECT

Another project, and one which the Army engineers have recommended, is the Lake Traverse-Boise de Sioux, a project to impound flood waters in White Rock, Minn., by the construction of an earth-fill dam and by the construction of levees and embankments to prevent flood damage at an estimated cost, according to the engineers of the War Department, of $1,400,000. Army engineers declare the project to be economically sound.

LAC QUI PARLE RESERVOIR

The Lac qui Parle Reservoir is a project for a control dam and reversing weir on the Chippewa River to divert its flood waters into a proposed reservoir and dam and control works on the Minnesota River just below the mouth of Lac qui Parle River to prevent floods and maintain levels. The cost is estimated at $300,000, and this project also has been declared by Army engineers to be economically sound.

ROSEAU RIVER

The Roseau River improvement project has also been recommended by the Army engineers. It provides for the excavation of the river and construction of dikes, and providing a diversion channel and storage reservoir in the Big Swamp at a cost of $1,760,000.

Other projects under consideration are the Pepin Reservoir on the Mississippi, the diversion of the Whetstone River in South Dakota into Big Stone Lake, power projects on Baptism River, Beaver Bay River, Brule River, Cascade River, Devil Track River, Gooseberry River, Kawishiwi River, Manitou River, Pidgeon River, Poplar River, Temperance River, and Vermillion River.

THE RED WING DAM

Dam no. 3 on the Mississippi River, above Red Wing, will give the beautiful city of Stillwater a 9-foot channel to the center of that industrial city. This dam must be constructed, and we mean to see that it is constructed. It is one of the 26 dams referred to in House Document 137, page 20, figure 5, Seventy-second Congress, first session. There is plenty of money available for this and other Minnesota projects, and we demand our full share for the North Star State. Huge amounts have gone to the States on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. It is time to remember the Central West, the Mississippi Valley, and Minnesota. We want shipping up the St. Croix River with a 9-foot channel, there being no locks necessary between the third dam mentioned above Red Wing until shipping reaches the city of Stillwater. What a splendid thing this will be for Washington County and Stillwater, the county seat.

MINNEAPOLIS HARBOR

Mr. Chairman, there is one other project with regard to which I wish to include data and information. It concerns the harbor of the great city of Minneapolis. We are building the 9-foot channel. It is estimated that it will cost about $126,000,000, and of this amount approximately $46,000,000 has been allotted. We shall go through with this great development of the inland waterways including and supporting the 26 dams on the upper Mississippi. But unless the city of Minneapolis has a harbor, the 9-foot channel will be of no avail to this, the greatest city of the Northwest.

According to the report of the Army engineers (H.Doc. No. 137, 72d Cong., 1st sess., p. 31), the head of navigation on the Mississippi River, under open-river conditions, was just within the lower limits of the city of Minneapolis, about 2 miles above the mouth of the Minnesota River; and from this point to the lower dam at St. Anthony Falls, a distance of 8 miles, strong rapids, with a fall of 40 feet, made navigation impossible except at high stages.

In 1917 the head of navigation was moved to the Washington Avenue Bridge, about 5 miles upstream to a point 0.6 of a mile below the lower dam power plant. At this time Lock and Dam No. 1 went into operation, and became known as the "Twin City Lock and Dam." The city built a barge line terminal above this point, 2 miles from the center of Minneapolis, and just at the edge of the present industrial development. At the present time there are shallow rapids extending for 0.6 of a mile above the Washington Avenue Bridge. At the head of the rapids is the lower dam, with a head of 20 feet. At St. Anthony Falls proper, about 0.6 of a mile farther upstream, is the upper dam, with a head of about 50 feet. Above the lower dam, within the city of Minneapolis, are 11 railway and highway bridges. Dredging would be necessary in both the upper and lower dam pools in order to build a 9-foot channel at these points. This information may be found in House Document No. 137, Seventy-second Congress, first session, page 31.

MINNEAPOLIS LEFT WITHOUT A HARBOR

In a report submitted for the city of Minneapolis by Theodore Brent and N. W. Elsberg at a congressional hearing in Washington, D.C., on January 26, 1932, it was pointed out that the failure of the Army Engineers to recommend the extension of the upper Mississippi 9-foot channel through the north line of the city of Minneapolis meant that the city of Minneapolis, the largest community and interchange point on the upper Mississippi, was left without any adequate area for the development of terminals. The report concluded that the local traffic of Minneapolis and its large interchange business could not possibly be adequately served through areas adjacent to the river in St. Paul.

The report states:

The examination of the physical characteristics of the terminal area has been thorough, the facts found as to the situation within Minneapolis clearly recognize the need of proper terminal provision, but the assumption that the city can be adequately served from outside is based upon erroneous data, and the conclusion to refrain from providing any adequate terminal area of this great transportation system with the city of Minneapolis would, in our judgment, militate against the broadest success of the whole Mississippi River improvement.

The Engineer's report itself, on page 7, states:

Studies made by the special board show that the present site of the Minneapolis terminal does not provide sufficient space for present traffic and does not permit expansion except as the channel is extended upstream.

WONDERFUL HARBOR POSSIBILITIES

On pages 31 and 32 the report states, with reference to the distance of 5 miles above St. Anthony Falls:

In this reach there are numerous opportunities for large terminal development, and for the development of private loading and unloading facilities, having the advantages of plenty of space, proximity to industries, warehouses, and railroads; direct rail connections, and a situation approximately at both river level and the general level of the city. No other area within Minneapolis has such advantages from the standpoint of terminal facilities (H.Doc. 173, 72d Cong., 1st sess.).

The 1932 report of the city of Minneapolis, already quoted, points out that the city has been laboring under almost insuperable handicaps in its attempt to develop the only possible present contact between the river and industrial and commercial life of the city and surrounding territory:

In the background we see the beginnings of industry, railroad facilities, and the heart of the city, just out of practical reach of river navigation.

MINNEAPOLIS—THE METROPOLIS OF THE NORTHWEST

As the report states, Minneapolis is the metropolis of the Northwest, having a population according to the 1930 census of 464,356; and it is the greatest railroad center in the Northwest, being served by nine trunk lines. Further, the city's 1932 report points out, Minneapolis is the largest center for the storage of grain in the United States, with a combined elevator capacity of 83,068,000 bushels; has a flour-milling capacity of 63,250 barrels daily; is the greatest milling center in the country; has diversified industries of many types; burns 1,600,000 tons of coal annually. Savings of water transportation are of vital importance to the entire city.

MINNEAPOLIS AND ST. PAUL HARBORS

We are delighted to know that St. Paul is to have a 9-foot channel to her door, but we want Minneapolis to have the same splendid opportunities for industrial development. In opposition to the conclusion that the St. Paul terminal can supply the needs of Minneapolis, the city's report informs us that between the St. Paul municipal terminal at Pig Eye Lake, southeast of St. Paul, and the southern boundary of Minneapolis, near the mouth of the Minnesota River, no railroad approaches the banks of the Mississippi River except the Milwaukee and the Omaha, and that there are in this whole reach no important railroad interchange yards adjacent to the river.

There is but one grain elevator in St. Paul. * * * Grain unloaded into Minneapolis elevators cannot reach this house in St. Paul at all except by the payment of an additional elevation charge of 1 cent per bushel plus a local rate of 4 cents per 100 pounds. The local rate to Duluth from Minneapolis elevators is only 5 cents per hundred pounds. Grain stores in Minneapolis elevators must be belted and spouted directly into barges on the river in Minneapolis at the single elevation charge necessary to load it into cars or it cannot move by river at all. The cost of delivery through St. Paul is prohibitive * * *. No coal can be distributed from any river terminal in St. Paul to any industry in Minneapolis. What has been said of coal and grain is true of commodities in general. When the harbor is completed, the wheat will move by river, and the annual public savings on this item directly creditable to the cost of providing a navigable channel through the harbor of Minneapolis will amount to $325,000.

MINNEAPOLIS FIGHTING FOR HARBOR

On January 16, 1934, a delegation of Minneapolis aldermen and other city officials called on Maj. Gen. Edward M. Markham, Chief of Engineers, in the War Department, and were given a hearing on the Minneapolis Harbor project. It was my great pleasure to sit in conference a number of times with these gentlemen and I am ready and willing to give aid at any and all times. A brief is being prepared by the city officials for submission to the War Department. General Markham is expected to be in Minneapolis in a short time to make a personal survey of the project. It is important to remember that two of the reasons for the disapproval of this project in former years by the Army engineers were a lack of interest on the part of the city itself and opposition by certain interests. The summary of the engineers' report stated (H.Doc. 137, 72d Cong., 1st sess., p. 48) that the project was not justified at the present time.

UNITED WE WIN—TEAMWORK NEEDED

Now there is an active interest in the project, as evidenced by the delegation sent to Washington recently by the city of Minneapolis. The Minneapolis press recently reported that a sum of $5,096,900 is being asked for the Minneapolis Harbor, and that a special committee of the Minneapolis Real Estate Board; the city council committee on commerce, markets, and harbors; Mayor A. G. Bainbridge's river development committee, headed by Dr. Paul Hartig; and north Minneapolis civic organizations are cooperating to urge the early completion of the project. When the Minneapolis delegation met in Washington with General Markham they were given a cordial reception. When they met with the Minnesota delegation in Congress they were assured of support. Lack of interest can no longer prevent the completion of the Minneapolis Harbor project.

WE MUST HAVE STANDARD OHIO LOCKS

We must have a harbor with locks of the standard Ohio size, 110 by 600 feet, taking the shipping above St. Anthony Falls. Let me call attention to the fact that we have a lock in the high dam, which is in the heart of Minneapolis, only 56 by 300 feet in size. This lock went out in a recent flood, and a new lock was built of the same small size, 56 by 300 feet. Our city, Mr. Chairman, is entitled to the standard Ohio-size locks, of 110 by 600 feet. The Hastings Lock, just below St. Paul, was built 110 by 500 feet long. It should be enlarged to 600 feet in order to give us the Ohio standard. The engineers tell me it can be extended this additional 100 feet; and it is essential that we have locks of the larger standard Ohio River size.

Engineer Francis M. Henry, of Minneapolis, who has for years been studying this project, points out that according to present plans for the upper Mississippi there will be 26 locks below St. Paul, each 600 feet long and 110 feet wide, but above that point all locks on the Mississippi River are planned to be 300 feet long and 56 feet wide. He states:

It is significant that the Pittsburgh people got a uniform size of lock at every dam on the Ohio River and by so doing established tows of uniform tonnage that would fit these locks and go through each one without untying. With long and high old-fashioned coal-burning steamboats they push tows containing about 7,200 tons through the 52 locks, wasting less than 20 minutes at each lockage. With short, powerful, low-clearance, diesel-electric push boats we will be able to push tows of over 8,000 tons through locks 600 feet long by 110 feet wide without untying, store the coal in under-water storage basins, and take back Minnesota iron ore and other commodities to St. Louis and points on the Ohio River.

MINNEAPOLIS DESERVES THE BEST

I am very much in favor of having locks at St. Anthony Falls, putting shipping into the pool above St. Anthony Falls, and having these locks built the regulation Ohio standard size. Engineers have stated that the pool above the falls at St. Anthony is the finest inland harbor in the United States; but it will be of no avail to us unless we get locks to the north harbor of Minneapolis, which will take the shipping and harbor facilities to the north limits of the city, and we can in time extend this harbor to the Coon River Dam, some miles above Minneapolis. [Applause.]

If this work is done, the Northwest will have a harbor at the head of navigation and the whole country will benefit from the project.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman please inform me how long ago the 300-foot locks were built?

Mr. LUNDEEN. The first lock at the Minneapolis high dam was built some years ago. That lock went out. Another 56- by 300-foot lock was built very recently.

Mr. CULKIN. I am interested to know if the lock which was built recently was the 300-foot lock?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I do not think that the plans were determined on as final, but they put in the 300-foot lock at the high dam.

Mr. CULKIN. They were locks of the old type?

Mr. LUNDEEN. Yes; they are of the type in use some years back on the Monongahela River. They are not standard Ohio locks.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. If the gentleman will permit, I will say that the Hastings locks were built in 1930, and the lock to replace the small one at the high dam was built last year.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I thank the gentleman, and I will fight for this north Minneapolis harbor until we get it. Minneapolis is entitled to a first-class 9-foot harbor to the north limits of that great city, and with it will come great industrial development; when coal, oil, and power meet iron ore at Minneapolis and St. Paul something is going to happen, and that will be prosperity and happiness for our splendid people.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I listened with considerable interest to the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. It so happens that about the time we were declaring war on Spain, I was in this neighborhood. From that time to this I have been impressed with the fact that we owe an obligation down there in Cuba. Having taken control of this island away from Spain, bad as her government was, and it may not be any better now; having invited people to go there, to invest their money there on the assurance they would be protected by the United States Government, we owe the obligation referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]: Proper support of this young graduate of Annapolis who has imbibed certainly some of the American ideas of freedom and government. If he is given proper support we may see an era of peace and tranquillity in that island. If not, we may see brought about the condition we once saw in Mexico where they had 39 presidents in 27 years, and the cabinet met by standing around with their backs to a wall—for obvious reasons—instead of facing each other across a table.

I am sorry my young friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN] is not here. He made some observations that were truly sensational. He talked about feeding starving people in America. Starving people! Yet the economists tell us that if we would cultivate here as intensively as they cultivate in Belgium and France we could feed 3,000,000,000 people. It has occurred to me throughout this session that if through legislation we could provide for the relief of the needy, furnish food to everybody, as much as they needed for proper nourishment, we would have no surplus of farm products. We do not know because we have not tried.

How do you know that we would need this complicated, involved, confusing idea of processing the farmer? I will not take the time to go into that, because I do not have it. I refer to a letter which I will have placed below in the RECORD.

I wish to refer to another point before I conclude, and that is that, in addition to the helpfulness we have in this situation in regard to labor, in this appropriation that will be made, as I understand it, there will be appropriated a billion dollars for public buildings. When we appropriate that money for public buildings and get buildings which are substantial and helpful to the people, you will have something when this orgy or strife is over.

In my district they have uncovered vast areas of glass sand of the best quality. Glass is being substituted to a large extent for marble in finishing buildings. This means a vast amount of labor for those who are working in sand. In my district, Huntingdon County, and in Mr. KURTZ's district, Blair County, Mifflin, and Bedford, and in several other counties in my State, this condition prevails.

This sand goes to Pittsburgh, Wheeling, and to other cities where the sand is converted into glass. This means a great deal of work for the American workman, and really of a new kind and of a great variety.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOCHT. I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN. I would like to know if there are many people out of employment in the gentleman's district?

Mr. FOCHT. Yes; as many in proportion, I suppose, as anywhere else in the United States. They are very much in need of work, and we try to do everything we can for them, just as the gentleman does over in his district.

Mr. McFARLANE. In regard to the processing tax you mentioned, I am sure the gentleman will agree that we must restore buying power in order to reemploy the people who are now out of work?

Mr. FOCHT. Absolutely. The whole thing we have done here is a farce, unless you throw in front of this production the power of consumption and the power to purchase by putting money in circulation. Stabilize the weekly pay envelop and you have something far better than the temporary hypodermic.

The matter referred to above is as follows:

GLASS-SAND ENTERPRISE

Upon his return from Washington Saturday night Congressman FOCHT had a confirmatory letter from the Treasury Department regarding the substitution of glass for marble in all lavatories in public buildings. This will mean immediate work for hundreds of men in Huntingdon, Juniata, Bedford, and other counties in the Eighteenth Congressional District, which Mr. FOCHT represents; also in the glass-manufacturing area about Pittsburgh. Mr. William J. Woods, of Lewistown, is president of one of the largest glass-sand operations in the country, with offices in Lewistown, and to him Mr. FOCHT sent the letter he received from Washington, which reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, July 28, 1933.

Letter July 22 addressed to Secretary Woodin.

Hon. BENJAMIN K. FOCHT,
Lewisburg, Pa.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your above-referred-to letter, this Department, after giving careful consideration to the matter has now decided to specify structural glass for toilet rooms in practically all of the Federal buildings under its control.

Very truly yours,

L. W. ROBERT, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

UNION COUNTY FARMER CALLS FOR COMMON SENSE

Up in Gregg township there resides a farmer who is a practical agriculturist and a philosopher. Mr. C. V. Michener works in the fields, looks after his herd of cattle, and sometimes comments on what he regards nonsensical and expensive methods of attempting to restore prosperity, particularly with officials bossing the business of farming and finally putting the farmer in some sections woefully in debt, and overdoing the thing in an attempt to drag him out.

Mr. Michener is serious minded about meddling into the farmers' business when the one thing the farmer most needs is to be let alone. He will survive this depression and America will never again be drawn into any such war, which will not be over until all European nations pay their debts and promise the world to be good.

Mr. Michener belongs to the old school of straight thinkers who believe in figuring on the cost of production or counting the cost, for only by the method of counting the cost can you know how much your taxes are going to be, and whether you are going to live at the same place next year or move. In commenting on some of the fantastic, impractical, and impossible theories of those in the administration in Washington in dealing with agriculture, Mr. Michener said:

"MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Am enclosing under separate cover a copy of the Rural New Yorker, containing several articles pertaining to the processing tax on hogs. The way it works, the producer pays the tax. Suppose I butchered a hog for my own use and sold a little sausage and lard to a friend, under the law I would have to pay the tax on the part sold. It is the most ridiculous law ever heard of, and works the reverse from what was intended.

"I predict that before the President and Secretary Wallace are through trying to enforce the A.A.A., they will find American farmers of the old stock are not European peasants. The German and Scotch-Irish farmers of the fertile Pennsylvania valleys will not submit to having their land confiscated, as insinuated by Mr. Wallace in a recent speech, nor will they long brook interference in what they consider their private affairs. I want to see a return to prosperity for the farmer and everyone, but I do not believe it is necessary to scrap the Constitution in order to achieve it.

"People seem to forget that there will always be adversity as well as prosperity in the lives of nations as well as the lives of men. Regardless as to whether the new deal works or not, the United States Government will survive.

"With very best regards, I am,

"Yours respectfully,

"C. V. MICHENER."

So here we have a real farmer, and a Union Countian, shooting a volley of common sense that shows courage and understanding of the greatest problem yet to be solved; and that is to serve the farmer in an economic, helpful way, but do not add new burdens to his present load of taxation and overhead to run a farm.

Cut down taxes and provide a market at a fair price.

That's what Farmer Michener says is wanted; and Michener is right, and in this theory most real farmers will agree.

B. K. F.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to place my stamp of approval upon the excellent remarks made by the gentleman from Minneapolis [Mr. LUNDEEN] regarding the upper harbor in the north Minneapolis district.

Some of you may ask, "Why go to the top of St. Anthony Falls?" It may interest you to know that the river banks right next to the water in the Mississippi River below St. Anthony Falls rises to a height of 150 to 200 feet. The banks are precipitous on both sides. There is absolutely no place along the river where shipping facilities exist or places for dockage. You cannot get to a railroad. You cannot transfer, load, or unload freight under such conditions as exist there. Therefore it becomes necessary to put in a set of locks in order to raise shipping up the height of the St. Anthony Dam; and when you get up to the top of St. Anthony Dam you are right out in an open pond, which covers six to eight hundred acres. You have surrounding the water a network of railroad yards so that boats could transfer freight from the boats to railroad cars. Everything has been built—except this one lock has not been included in the set-up or plan. You can readily see that with banks several hundred feet high on each side of the water, and the water coming right to the bank, it is almost impossible to put in elevators to take care of your freight and to take care of ships with dockage conditions as they are.

For that reason it is very imperative in connection with the 9-foot channel proposition that this be extended up above St. Anthony Falls to give us ample room for dockage facilities.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I want to call attention to the business men's delegation from the city of Minneapolis and their unanimous report. They were here a few days ago, were they not?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. They gave unanimous approval to this project. The economic necessity for this need is very apparent.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes. If this is not done, the 9-foot channel will be useless to the city of Minneapolis, which is the largest shipping center in the entire Northwest. So I hope this will receive the undivided attention of the gentlemen.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. RICH. In advocating the improvement the gentleman speaks of, does the gentleman think that the traffic involved and the saving to the people of his district will compensate the taxpayers of this country for the enormous expense in the construction of the waterway to Minneapolis and the Northwest in connection with the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. It would on coal alone. It would open up the entire eastern territory, and the Ohio River, for our coal. But if we have to take our coal and lift it 200 feet to the top of a river bank, and having done that, move it several miles in order to put it on a railroad car to reship, perhaps it would not be.

Mr. RICH. But the gentleman wants to lift the boats and everything above the river.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. We want it on a level with the railroad where we have dockage facilities. By the expenditure of another $4,000,000 we could have a perfect layout.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, there being no further request for time, I ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigating official matters under the control of the Department of the Interior; for protecting timber on the public lands, and for the more efficient execution of the law and rules relating to the cutting thereof; for protecting public lands from illegal and fraudulent entry or appropriation; for adjusting claims for swamp lands and indemnity for swamp lands; and for traveling expenses of agents and others employed hereunder, $362,560, including not exceeding $20,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, and not exceeding $33,000 for the purchase, exchange, operation, and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles and motor boats for the use of agents and others employed in the field service.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee whether an allocation of funds under the division of investigation can be made for the examination or promotion of any reclamation project. I note that on page 53 of the bill, a saving clause has been inserted preventing any funds allocated to the Bureau of Reclamation from being used for such purpose, but I am rather anxious to see that not a single dollar in this bill, if it can be prevented, is used for the purpose of promoting the reclamation of any lowlands or marshlands or any additional reclamation units, in view of the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture has recommended the socialization, practically, of almost 286,000,000 acres of land in this country, and that $25,000,000 has already been allocated for this purpose.

Can the chairman of the subcommittee tell me whether in any section of this bill, any money whatsoever can be used for further reclamation work?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am quite certain there is no such intention, and there is no provision here for any additional or new reclamation work. All investigations are with respect to activities that we have now. The law provides that there shall be no new reclamation projects started.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The language of this particular section or paragraph is "for investigating official matters under the control of the Department of the Interior", and the power under that language is perhaps sufficiently broad to include some reclamation promotional work.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Even if they made any investigations of that kind, there is a law prohibiting the starting of any new ones, and Congress is in no mood to create any new projects now.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Would the committee have any objection to the insertion of an amendment somewhere in the bill to the effect that no expenditure whatsoever shall be made for that purpose?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will turn to page 53——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have read the paragraph on page 53.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That provides that no part of any appropriation in this act for the Bureau of Reclamation shall be used for investigations to determine the economic and/or financial feasibility of any new reclamation projects.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That section applies only to the allocation that has been made to the Bureau of Reclamation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That was put in there, practically, by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] a year ago to prohibit the initiation of new reclamation projects.

Mr. GOSS. I may say, however, on reading the hearings I understood that some of the C.W.A. money had been put out for new projects. Of course, we did put prohibitory language in the bill, but there is a new way now to go ahead and do this through the C.W.A.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Connecticut is a member of this committee and knows that we have not a thing to do with that.

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I realize that; but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that it can be done under that power.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; it can be done in that way, but there is no such intention here.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, for the last 2 or 3 years I have endeavored to call the attention of the House to the item of permanent, indefinite, and specific appropriations. There was appointed a new subcommittee in the Appropriations Committee in reference to this matter.

I checked up today and I find that in the Budget of this year there is about $2,500,000,000 of permanent appropriations.

There is absolutely no way that the House of Representatives or the body at the other end of the Capitol can reach any of the items included in the $2,500,000,000 through the annual appropriation bills, because it is permanent law, and some of the laws have been on the statute books 100 years or more.

I wish to call the attention of the committee this afternoon to page 33 of the report, where we find that the estimated permanent appropriations for 1935 amount to $15,503,000 and odd. I have just talked with the chairman of the subcommittee and I find there are, perhaps, eight or nine items which come under permanent appropriations that are also carried in the bill as supplementary items.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman knows that those items are not in this bill at all.

Mr. GOSS. I understand that, but what I am saying is this: There are, for instance, the items for vocational education, Indian money, trust funds, civilization of the Sioux—there are many millions of dollars of permanent appropriations carried under these items and yet we are specifically supplementing these permanent appropriations with other items in the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But not in this bill.

Mr. GOSS. Yes; in this bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The matters that are inserted on page 33——

Mr. GOSS. They are the permanent appropriations, but we are carrying supplementary items in this bill on the subject, and what I am getting at is simply this: This subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations should start hearings at this session and go into the entire subject where we have over $2,000,000,000 involved. I want to call attention to the fact that we carry an item of two and a half million dollars as a permanent appropriation and we carry another item of two and a half million dollars in the annual supply bill for the same purpose; so that instead of the Congress having at its command the power to raise or lower these appropriations, such action is beyond our power so long as we continue these permanent, indefinite, and specific appropriations.

Mr. HASTINGS. I invite the gentleman's attention to the fact that there has been a Subcommittee on Appropriations on that matter.

Mr. GOSS. That is what I say; but these bills come upon the floor carrying appropriations and there is not going to be any way this session that any Member of the House or the other body can do anything about it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This committee has nothing whatever to do with what is on that page. It was unnecessary for us to put that tabulation in our report; but the committee thought that it was important information that the House might be interested in.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman and I are not far apart. I have spoken on the matter for 3 or 4 years, and finally a subcommittee was appointed.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The gentleman does not want anyone to believe that he is responsible for the appointment of the committee?

Mr. GOSS. No; I do not.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The gentleman knows that the matter has been under discussion for more than 15 years—a list of these permanent and indefinite appropriations. It was during Mr. BYRNS' chairmanship that this subcommittee was created.

Mr. GOSS. What has been done about it? I am asking for action so that when the bill comes up hearings can be had on the matter and the House can act intelligently. There is no way that we can reach these items on page 33.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am surprised that the gentleman's committee has not taken action on the matter.

Mr. GOSS. So am I, and I hope the gentleman will assist in trying to get the committee to act at this session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for the Department of the Interior, including all of its bureaus, offices, institutions, and services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, except the Alaska Railroad, the Geological Survey, and the Bureau of Reclamation, $113,000, of which $30,000 shall be for the Office of National Parks, Buildings, and Reservations, and $30,000 for the Office of Education, no part of which shall be available for correspondence instruction.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 10, after the comma strike out "$113,000" and insert "$123,000." after the word "and", in line 12, page 6, strike out "$30,000" and insert "$40,000."

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I am very reluctant at all times to offer amendments to appropriation bills, for I know that subcommittees have spent much time in the examination of estimates, and in their determination of the amounts they feel that are necessary to be expended to carry out the proper governmental functions.

This is an amendment, however, that seems to me to be entirely worthy. It relates to the printing of documents and pamphlets by the Commissioner of Education that should be in the hands of educators throughout the country.

This office makes investigations on educational subjects, and after doing so it is necessary for the information to be disseminated to school superintendents, libraries, and to other educational agents. Without adequate funds for the printing of the material it is not available after it is prepared.

Therefore, any crippling of the printing fund of the Commissioner of Education is a distinct detriment to education throughout the United States.

I know of one instance in the city of Portland, Oreg., where the superintendent of city schools in that city stated that approximately $6,000,000 was saved to the city of Portland as the result of information that was furnished to him on the city's building program.

That is one instance, and one instance only, out of perhaps hundreds that could be cited where savings have been accomplished by the existence of this Bureau and its ability to disseminate worth-while information to people who are interested in schools and school matters.

I am just as much opposed to the dissemination of propaganda by the Bureau of Education as any man on the floor of the House, and when the office of the Commissioner of Education was engaged in the dissemination of propaganda I sought a reduction of this appropriation. However, that policy has been stopped. I secured a list of the publications now being put out, and not a single one of them is of a propaganda nature. All relate to methods of education.

Furthermore, this money is not money that is spent and lost, but is money that is appropriated and is largely returned to us because, out of an expenditure of $30,000 last year in excess of $27,000 of that money was returned, so that the appropriation of $30,000 last year represented an actual outlay of less than $3,000.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am informed that this year probably they will pay in a great deal more than the gentleman has mentioned. In other words, I understand the Bureau of Education will turn back more than $30,000 in sales for printed documents.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The gentlewoman is entirely right about that, and in addition to the number sold there has been furnished to county superintendents of education and libraries throughout the United States, free of cost, these publications to the extent of 7,000. If this amendment is defeated, it means that the 7,000 school superintendents throughout the United States, city superintendents, and libraries will be denied these free pamphlets and documents that heretofore have been furnished to them. Our States and cities are unable to properly function educationally because they are too poor. It therefore seems to me to be parsimony of the very worst type for us to cripple an agency of the Government that is worth so much in a financial and educational way to the citizens of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I rise to speak in favor of this amendment. I have a great many requests from my district for information that this Bureau of Education can provide. I am very much interested in the education of children and of adults in this country. The Bureau has requests from a good many of the States where the schools are not in operation. The public as a whole has little realization of the thousands of school children who cannot receive education because the schools are closed. The situation is extremely serious today. This information is more needed than ever before, particularly in the rural districts, where there are not so many schools, and where they have not so many teachers. It is very valuable to the people of the farming communities to be able to get this information from the Bureau of Education. This Bureau has more requests for this material than it has ever had in years past, yet their appropriation is smaller. I earnestly hope this small amount may be appropriated for printing. It will not cost the taxpayer anything—or the Government in the end—because the money is paid back to the Government when the publications are ordered from the Superintendent of Documents. They have to be paid for at the rate of 50 cents a copy. The number of free copies has been very greatly reduced.

Let us consider again what an appropriation of only $30,000 means to the service which Congress expects of the agency which it has been maintaining for more than 60 years.

It means that Congress is asking the Office of Education to do a 1935 job with 1907 printing appropriation.

In fact, we have to go back to 1898 to find a period when the Office of Education printing funds were regularly less than $30,000.

It means that the Office of Education, having collected important and useful information, cannot supply the information to county superintendents or city superintendents in the States and in the congressional districts. There are more than 7,000 city and county superintendents of schools in the United States. Due to the small amount of money for printing, the Office of Education is compelled to limit most of its editions to 3,500, which is only enough to serve State officials and major libraries.

A $30,000 printing appropriation means, also, that the Office of Education must use the mimeograph more extensively to publish the products of its work. I am informed that in the long run this costs the Government more than printing.

It means that Congress is failing to reward an agency which makes probably as good use of what printing money it has as any bureau of the Government. I call your attention to the fact that sales of the Office of Education publications last year totaled $27,000, which went to the Treasury. Contrast this with the appropriation of $30,000 for printing. I am informed that sales for the current year may exceed the amount appropriated. In other words, the Office of Education is obtaining modest fees for the publications it provides. But it cannot provide the service or obtain the fees for the Treasury unless it has sufficient funds to print the publications originally in editions large enough to permit educators and citizens to know that information is available.

The Office of Education is the national census agency for American education. It is the only national center collecting information on progressive innovations in education springing up in various parts of the country. Members of Congress are staunch advocates of education. One of the best ways they can assist education is to increase the printing funds by which vital information can be distributed. Progress is built on facts and ideas. By spreading facts and ideas on education collected by the Office of Education Congress can truly promote progress in education in every city, town, and hamlet in our country.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, no Member on the floor of the House is more interested in education than I am. I used to be a school teacher myself once upon a time, and I know and thoroughly appreciate the benefits and importance of education. However, this is the situation and I simply pass it on to the Committee: Last year we gave them for this item $40,000. Twenty-five percent of that was impounded, so that they did not get it. They got $30,000 for this printing item. The Budget recommended the same amount for this year. It came to us in that way with the endorsement of the President carrying out his 25 percent policy of reduction. As a matter of fact, we all know that that has been the policy of the administration and the policy of the majority party.

Whether it is wise to make that reduction on education is for you to decide. It is true they sell a large number of these pamphlets. They sold $27,113 worth last year, but we have a very large number of activities under the Interior Department. All of them are appealing to us for more appropriations for printing. As a matter of fact, these days they seem to have a lot of Federal employees who are writing theses on all kinds of subjects and they want us to publish them. If we open up the gate for unlimited printing and disregard the Federal Budget, disregard the President's 25-percent cut, and disregard the action of the committee, there is no telling where this voluminous printing eagerness may go to.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; not now. If we disregard all of the background of this item, I do not see how we can prevent a large number of other appeals for printing coming in that are equally as meritorious. At the present time our Government is spending enormous sums of money on education. We are right now spending $2,000,000 a month in relief to education and to 40,000 teachers in this country, so that the Government is being liberal with education. This present reduction is not at all ruining education. It is giving them exactly what they had last year, and they have not suffered any, I think. There seems to have been a large amount of misinformation circulated throughout the country about this matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to say to the gentleman that this matter of vocational education is a matter that I am tremendously interested in, and have been for a number of years.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand the chairman of the subcommittee that the appropriation in this bill for the next fiscal year is the same as for the present fiscal year?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is the same as they obtained this year. After impounding the 25 percent of the $40,000 that was given them, they had to and did get along on the balance—$30,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will turn to page 30 of the report of his committee it appears to me, although I may be mistaken about my calculations, that the appropriation for all of the national enterprises of the Government for the year 1934 were $2,757,700,000, and that the item carried in this bill is $1,222,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is talking about the printing item here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But I am not talking about printing. Perhaps I had better wait until we come to that paragraph.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman is talking about vocational education.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That has not anything to do with this Bureau of Education.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purpose of encouraging industry and self-support among the Indians and to aid them in the culture of fruits, grains, and other crops, $325,000, which sum may be used for the purchase of seeds, animals, machinery, tools, implements, and other equipment necessary, and for advances to Indians having irrigable allotments to assist them in the development and cultivation thereof, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, to enable Indians to become self-supporting: Provided, That the expenditures for the purposes above set forth shall be under conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for repayment to the United States on or before June 30, 1940, except in the case of loans on irrigable lands for permanent improvement of said lands, in which the period for repayment may run for not exceeding 20 years, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That except for expenditures for the benefit of the Pima Indians, not to exceed $25,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be expended on any other one reservation or for the benefit of any other one tribe of Indians: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to make advances from this appropriation to old, disabled, or indigent Indian allottees for their support, to remain a charge and lien against their lands until paid: Provided further, That advances may be made to worthy Indian youths to enable them to take educational courses, including courses in nursing, home economics, forestry, and other industrial subjects in colleges, universities, or other institutions, and advances so made shall be reimbursed in not to exceed 8 years, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARENS: Page 16, line 17, after the figures "$325,000", insert "not to exceed the sum of $5,000 of this amount may be used for the establishing of cooperative marketing on this crop and other Indian products such as wild rice, berries, fish, and furs."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, we have conferred on this side and we do not see any objection to the amendment. I want to ask the gentleman a question first, however. As I understand it, this does not increase the appropriation?

Mr. ARENS. No; it does not.

Mr. HASTINGS. But it allows $5,000 of the amount appropriated to be used for this particular purpose?

Mr. ARENS. They may use $5,000 of this amount for that purpose.

Mr. HASTINGS. If there is no objection on the other side, we will accept the amendment.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. There is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ARENS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pipestone, Minn.: For 250 pupils, $73,680; for pay of superintendent, drayage, and general repairs and improvements, $14,690; in all, $88,370.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall not use 5 minutes, but I simply want to direct an inquiry to the chairman of the subcommittee. I am simply inquiring to make certain of what appears to me to be true from the evidence laid before the committee in the hearing, namely, that the cut for the institution at Pipestone in which I am interested, is about in line with the cuts that all of the other schools must suffer as a result of the inauguration of the policy of reduction of number of pupils in the institutions?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That is absolutely true. It is a horizontal reduction.

Mr. KVALE. I think it is regrettable, but I shall not offer an amendment to correct it, in view of the fact that it is a uniform policy.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chemawa, Salem, Oreg.: For 300 pupils, including not to exceed $1,000 for printing and issuing school paper, $97,120; for pay of superintendent, drayage, and general repairs and improvements, $14,620; in all, $111,740.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take this opportunity to say a word or two in defense of these nonreservation Indian boarding schools, appropriations for which have been very drastically cut by this bill. I also want to voice my protest against the general policy of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in regard to nonreservation Indian boarding schools, which policy is to gradually abolish this class of Indian education altogether. Furthermore, I desire to protest against what I have considered to be a distinctly high-handed and autocratic attitude on the part of the Interior Department in relation to such schools.

I wish to make it clear at the outset that I am not speaking from a local or sectional viewpoint. The fact is that the Salem Indian Training School at Chemawa, which is located in the district I represent, has fared very well in this bill in comparison with the other nonreservation Indian boarding schools of the country. The cut which this particular school has had to take is much less than the average, and we have at least succeeded in keeping the Chemawa school open and operating while five or six similar institutions have been closed altogether by virtue of this bill through the simple expedient of not appropriating any money for their continuance. It is against the general policy of the Interior Department in connection with these schools that I am directing my remarks, and it is to the policy that I object.

There are at present some 26 nonreservation Indian schools in the United States. Up until the last session of the Congress it had been the established policy of the Government to educate certain classes of young Indians in these schools. Some of the schools are more than half a century old. Everybody thought that the Government's policy of maintaining these particular schools for vocational training and technical education of Indian children was a firmly established, permanent policy. New Members of Congress from States having nonreservation Indian boarding schools who came to Congress for the first time at the last special session, and who were unaware either that there had been a change of policy in regard to these schools or that a direct attack by the Interior Department was to be made upon them, received a distinct shock late in the special session when they learned that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, without warning and without any hearing, had summarily issued an order abolishing six of the largest nonreservation Indian boarding schools in the country. This order, I may say, was actually made, and the superintendents of the several schools involved were actually notified, before the Members of Congress knew that the Commissioner had made such an order or that he had any intention of making such an order.

At the urgent demand of a number of us from the West, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs finally called a hearing after the order was made. To us it appeared like locking the door after the horse had been stolen. It was at this hearing that these Members of Congress first learned just what the Commissioner had done and why he did it. And it was at this hearing that most of them learned for the first time that in the previous session of the Congress the Committee on Indian Affairs had recommended a change of policy in regard to nonreservation Indian boarding schools, and that that policy called for their gradual elimination. The bill declaring such a policy was passed at that session and is now the law.

At this hearing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs explained that up until the time of the passage of the economy act he had no idea of putting this policy into immediate effect, but that the economy act obliged him to start at once upon the elimination of nonreservation Indian boarding schools. It was brought out that under the economy act the Interior Department was required to make certain reductions in expenditures. These reductions were apportioned out among the several bureaus of that Department, including the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The Indian Affairs Bureau had barely enough money to provide for the education of Indians, yet, under the orders brought down from above, it was obliged to make the cut anyway. According to the Commissioner, the only branch of Indian education where any cut whatever could be made was in nonreservation Indian boarding schools and, according, and in compliance with this economy demand, the Commissioner issued his order closing six of these schools altogether.

It may give you some idea of the ruthlessness of this procedure and its utter disregard for the consequences when I tell you that according to the Commissioner's statement the entire amount which could be saved annually by abolishing these six schools would be a little more than half a million dollars. To effect this saving the order contemplated not only the closing of the schools, but the junking of their physical plants valued in the aggregate at more than $4,000,000. The order not only put an end to the technical training of the young Indians in these schools, but it also closed the door upon hundreds of orphans who had no family ties whatever and to whom the nonreservation Indian boarding schools had literally been an alma mater.

I know that to those of you who live in the East and have problems of your own to take care of the fate of the nonreservation Indian boarding school can hold but little interest. I cannot help feeling, however, that you must be impressed by the economic folly of the policy I am now condemning. At least I believe you will agree with me that what I have just stated as to the consequences of this policy is sufficient to warrant a thorough consideration of it by the Indian Affairs Committee when next that committee takes up the subject of Indian education. And whatever you may think of the economic phase of it, the human side of the situation, I am sure, cannot fail to appeal to you.

Briefly, let me tell you what a nonreservation Indian boarding school is. I speak of the Salem School at Chemawa, because it is typical, in a way, of all the others, and because it is the one with which I am most familiar. This school was established on a tract of land near the capital of my State which the Indians themselves helped to purchase and deed to the Government. Although the deed was unconditional in its terms, it was given to the Government for the purpose of establishing and maintaining an educational institution where Indians from all parts of the Northwest and from Alaska could come and live while they were being instructed in the ordinary primary-, grammar-, and high-school studies, and while they were being taught trades and occupations which would fit them for a useful career as citizens. Some of the reservations from which they came had no reservation schools or even public schools. A considerable portion of them were orplans, and many more had but one parent. The children in this school receive technical training in all the occupations and vocations for which the Indian is adapted, and almost without exception the graduates return to their own communities fully equipped to enter upon a useful career, and invariably they have become the leading Indian citizens of their community. The Government has invested more than a million dollars in the physical plant of this school. We consider it to be one of the most valuable educational institutions in the Northwest; and I am sure the people of other States feel the same way about their own Indian schools. If this school should be closed, many of the students upon their return to reservations would find no schools at all available for higher education. Others would return to communities where there would be no public schools reasonably within their reach. A great many would return to parents who are too poor to clothe and feed them, while nearly one third of the boys and girls of tender age at this particular school would have no homes at all to return to, because, as I have said, they are orphans.

When I learned of the order closing this school and the reasons given for closing it, I confess I was indignant, and I believe justifiably so. Since the Seventy-second Congress, early in the session, had already appropriated $240,000 for the maintenance of this school, I took the case to the Comptroller General on the theory that this money, having been appropriated for this purpose, must all revert to the general fund in case this school was abolished. The Comptroller General held with me in this view, but even the Comptroller's written opinion was not sufficient to change the determination of the Interior Department and the Bureau of Indian Affairs to carry out this policy of nonreservation Indian boarding-school elimination.

Finally I went to what I considered, under the circumstances, the court of last resort. In company with the senior Senator from my State, we called on the President and presented the facts to him. What ideas the President may have had as to the economic phase of the situation I am sure the human side of it appealed to him, for he immediately telephoned the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and asked him to set aside his order until further consideration of the whole matter could be had. Not only was this done, but upon further consideration the order, at least so far as it affected the Salem School at Chemawa, was permanently rescinded and the school still remains in operation, although on a curtailed basis.

This bill gives us $111,000 for this year. It is a great deal better, of course, than nothing, and it is better than what at least five of the other schools which were marked for slaughter under this policy have received. I presume, in the circumstances, I ought to be satisfied; but I am not. It is the policy of the Interior Department, which still exists and which still has for its ultimate object the destruction of all schools of this kind, to which I object. I am making this statement here not with the hope of increasing the appropriation for any of these schools at the present session, for I know that is not possible, but rather I am making it for the information of the Congress and with the hope that the Indian Affairs Committee, by the next session at least, will make a thorough investigation of this entire policy with the view of reversing it if the facts show they were mistaken in declaring such a policy in the Seventy-second Congress. If this policy is reversed after the investigation is made, I shall be satisfied. The increased annual appropriations will then take care of themselves.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. Certainly.

Mr. TABER. Why did the gentleman not get an allotment from the Public Works Administration office for that? Everybody else does. That is the way they make up their appropriations everywhere else.

Mr. MOTT. I will say to the gentleman from New York that allotments for nonreservation Indian boarding schools are certainly not to be obtained from P.W.A. funds, because it is the Secretary of the Interior who is the administrator of that fund, and the Secretary of the Interior himself is the very man who is insisting on closing all the nonreservation Indian boarding schools. It is in his Department that the policy originated. As I have said, however, it is not the allotment or the appropriation itself at which I am directing my objection here. It is to the policy of the Department in regard to these schools which I believe is wrong and which I want changed.

The Interior Department and the Bureau of Indian Affairs believe that all Indians, wherever they live, can be properly educated either in reservation schools or in the public schools. The Department even contends that the Indians themselves believe this, and that they want to be educated in reservation schools and public schools. The Indians in my State do not believe so, and on this point I should like to read a letter received from the Indians themselves. The letter is from a representative group of Indians at the Warm Springs Reservation, in the eastern part of Oregon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOTT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes in order to give the House this personal message of the Indians themselves on this reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. Here, omitting the introductory part, is the letter. It is dated May 31, 1933, shortly after the Commissioner's order was made:

> We, the undersigned Indians of the Warm Springs Reservation, Oreg., hereby protest closing of the Indian School at Chemawa, Oreg., for the reason that such action is utterly unjust to us and to other Indians of the Northwest, for if said school is not reopened it will deprive Indian youth of our reservation of higher educational advantages. We submit that in this sparsely settled region there are no public schools available for advanced pupils of the reservation, and if the Salem School is not reopened said children will be without school facilities in the future. Furthermore, due to the present wide-spread economic conditions, we are not financially able to properly clothe and feed our children, even if public schools were available, and it would be a gross injustice to us, as well as to hundreds of other Indians, to close the Salem School at this time. Our Government is spending literally billions of dollars to rehabilitate the white citizens of the Nation, and there should be no discrimination as to Indians. The Salem School has been very helpful to Indians of the Northwest, particularly in view of the many orphans who have no homes, and we respectfully urge that the order to close said school be rescinded forthwith.

Mr. Chairman, to the few nonreservation Indian boarding schools which, with the Salem School at Chemawa, have by this bill succeeded in continuing their existence, although with diminished appropriation, I offer my congratulations. For the five or six other schools that have sustained the blow of the Indian Commissioner's ax and who, by this bill, have been closed altogether, I express my very deep sympathy. To the House, and particularly to the Committee on Indian Affairs, I express the hope that without undue delay they will make a complete investigation of the whole policy of the Interior Department in regard to nonreservation Indian boarding schools. If they will do this and will follow the dictates of their own judgment, I believe the policy to which I have called the attention of the House will be reversed. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, not to go into a general argument of this question, I think I ought to say to the gentleman from Oregon that this policy is not a new matter that is being started now. It was started during the last administration. It was started by a Senate amendment to the Interior Department appropriation bill for the past year, providing that not to exceed $500,000 of the appropriation for those schools might be used toward the construction of day schools.

What they are trying to do—whether they make a success of it or not is not for me to say—is to gradually reduce the Indian boarding schools and replace these Indians in day schools and, where possible, put them in white schools. There seems to be a sentiment that if the Indians can go to white schools and, we might say, brush up along with the white children it may aid in their education and general information, and it would cost a great deal less for the tuition of these Indians in such white day schools than it costs to maintain these large, tremendously expensive boarding schools. Whether or not this policy is sound I do not pretend to say, but we have now taken this from the Budget, as we took it from the former administration. The present Bureau of Indian Affairs is carrying out this policy. They have eliminated several of the smaller schools. They have made a horizontal reduction, as I said to the gentleman from Wisconsin, in, I think, all of the boarding schools. The Indian Bureau officials presented this matter to the committee and the committee considered it pretty carefully. They said they were taking care of these children who were taken out of the boarding schools by placing them in other schools. If they are, and if the schools are of equal merit and worth, we see no objection to it.

My colleague the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] knows more about the subject, I think, than anybody in either branch of Congress. He and the rest of us are simply watching whether or not it is going to work out. We are not entirely sold on this matter ourselves; but if it does work out as they claim it will—and everybody knows that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are people who nearly all their lives have taken a great interest in the Indians—it will be beneficial. Of course, if the policy does not work out satisfactorily, we will reject it.

Mr. MOTT. If I may answer the gentleman's observation: In the first place, I doubt very much whether the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma is fully in accord with the present policy of the Bureau of Indian Affairs.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I did not say he was in accord with it. I said he knew more about the Indians than any of the rest of us. One third of all the Indians of the United States live in Oklahoma, and the gentleman from Oklahoma has lived among or near them all his life, and he has represented them for 30 years.

Mr. MOTT. I am quite willing to admit that.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Natives in Alaska: To enable the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under his direction, to provide for support and education of the Eskimos, Aleuts, Indians, and other natives of Alaska, including necessary traveling expenses of pupils to and from industrial boarding schools in Alaska; erection, purchase, repair, and rental of school buildings, including purchase of necessary lands; textbooks and industrial apparatus; pay and necessary traveling expenses of superintendents, teachers, physicians, and other employees; repair, equipment, maintenance, and operation of vessels; and all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under the above special heads, including $285,600 for salaries in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $17,500 for traveling expenses, $180,500 for equipment, supplies, fuel, and light, $23,000 for repairs of buildings, $63,000 for freight and operation and repair of vessels, $1,000 for rentals, and $2,000 for telephone and telegraph; total, $572,600, to be immediately available: Provided, That not to exceed 10 percent of the amounts appropriated for the various items in this paragraph shall be available interchangeably for expenditures on the objects included in this paragraph, but not more than 10 percent shall be added to any one item of appropriation except in cases of extraordinary emergency, and then only upon the written order of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided further, That of said sum not exceeding $5,800 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIMOND: On page 32, line 24, after the word "including", strike out "$285,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$385,000."

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, this is the only way I know of to get this matter before the House for decision and determination.

As I said yesterday, the native Indians of Alaska—and I include the Eskimos as well as the Indians—have never been treated with the same degree of fairness or generosity, if you call it that, as have the Indians of the United States. The present bill shows that and it was conclusively demonstrated in the information as given out yesterday in the speech of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS]. Under this bill the Indians of the United States who are in the ward status are given $60 per head for education and other relief, while in Alaska they are being given less than half of that. They need the same help in Alaska. They need it there just as much as everywhere else, and I think in some cases the necessity is perhaps greater. One of the troubles has been that the Indians of Alaska have been too patient. It has never been necessary at the end of a war in which a lot of people were killed to make a treaty with them, build schools for them, and take care of them generally, as has been the case in this country. In Alaska, as elsewhere, the people who have demanded the most have received the most. The Indians of the continental United States have demanded a lot more than the Indians of Alaska and they have been accorded a great deal more. Of course, Alaska was taken over from Russia and no one paid a great deal of attention to the Indians up there for a long time. As a result, the Indians have been crowded off of their fishing grounds, they have been pushed away from the valleys from which they secured their supply of game. The white man has elbowed them out.

It is the duty of the Government to give them a fair degree of education so that they can meet the conditions with which they will be confronted in civilized life. These are fine, upright, sturdy people. They are good citizens, and they have the making of better citizens. You cannot expect much for the future in the way of decent and right citizenship from these people in Alaska, who are citizens of the United States under the mandate of Congress just as much as we are, unless we furnish them facilities for education. This has not been done. Why can we not make a start now? I am only asking an amendment of this bill by requesting an additional $100,000, and in making this request I am surprised at my own modesty. If I did full justice to the Indians of Alaska I should ask for double the amount carried in the bill, but I realize that as a practical matter unless I make my demands modest I will not get anything. But $100,000, Mr. Chairman, will furnish a few schools for some of the native children of Alaska who are now going without education.

I was astounded when I read the figures given by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] in reference to the very considerable amount of money spent at Chemawa and the number of buildings at Chemawa. It is a splendid school. But I am inclined to believe that the treatment of the Indians in the United States generally is a long tale of dishonor; it is a long tale of willful carelessness and a disregard of the rights of the Indians. When the white men came to Alaska, as they have done in past years, and when they took the means of livelihood very largely away from the Indians, the least the Government of the United States can do—and this is a burden, of course, upon the Federal Government and not primarily upon the Territory—is to give them the fair opportunity of securing an education.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman from Oklahoma will yield, may I ask the gentleman from Alaska if it is not a fact that prior to the time the Interior Department began its policy of curtailing the facilities of nonreservation Indian boarding schools hundreds of Alaskan Indians were sent continuously to the Chemawa Indian Training School at Salem and received their education there at the expense of the Government?

Mr. DIMOND. That is quite correct. I could not say as to the exact number, but a good many of our Indians were sent down there. However, I am not in position to quarrel with this policy of Indian administration. Some of the boarding schools in Alaska have been closed, too. Of course, this has hurt us.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will not prevail.

Alaska is about one fifth the size of the entire United States. There are approximately 27,000 or 28,000 Indians in Alaska, and they are scattered everywhere. The Government has been more generous with the Indians and the people of Alaska than with any Indian tribes in this country. We have expended for this same purpose for the current year $557,000. It is not as practicable to establish Indian schools in Alaska as it is on an Indian reservation in the United States, for the reason that a great many of them live a long distance apart. The Government has established day schools in Alaska where there are only 8 or 10 or quite a small number of Indian children.

I think the Government of the United States, from my investigation and after a visit to Alaska, has done fairly well and is fairly generous with the Indians up there in the establishment of both boarding and day schools. In the last 3 or 4 years they have established or are establishing 4 boarding schools at different points in that country.

The Delegate from Alaska complains that we are not spending as much money up there as we spend on the Indians in this country. I tried to explain yesterday that it costs much more when you have allotted Indian lands and you have to have individual supervision of each Indian. In Alaska they do not have any allotment of lands. They are still like the Indians were in the United States some 40 or 50 or 60 years ago before the passage of the act of 1887.

I venture to say, Mr. Chairman, we are spending far more upon the Indians of Alaska per capita than we did upon the Indians of this country prior to the time we started to allot the lands to the Indians in this country.

I think the amount that is appropriated, $572,600 for the next year, is fairly generous to these people, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That 10 percent of the foregoing amounts shall be available interchangeably for expenditures in the various hospitals named, but not more than 10 percent shall be added to the amount appropriated for any one of said hospitals or for any particular item within any hospital, and any interchange of appropriations hereunder shall be reported to Congress in the Annual Budget: Provided further, That nonreservation boarding schools receiving specific appropriations shall contribute on a per diem basis for the hospitalization of pupils in hospitals located at such schools and supported from this appropriation;

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking the chairman of the subcommittee a question.

I notice at several places in this bill, with respect to interchange of expenditures in hospitals and schools, and so on, there is a limitation of 10 percent. I was under the impression the law provided 12 percent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As the gentleman knows, this is a large lump-sum appropriation, and occasionally a school building may burn down, or something of that sort happens, and they very seriously need more funds than are allotted to that activity, so they borrow from some other fund. We have found it is not only good policy but that it is very necessary and saves a lot of hardship to give the officials in charge a little leeway in their expenditures. That is all this does. This policy has been carried on for several years.

Mr. GOSS. That is what I wanted to know. Has it been 10 percent every year with respect to these items?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I was under the impression it has been 12 percent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; 10 percent under these items.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of a point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fulfilling treaties with Choctaws, Oklahoma: For permanent annuity (art. 2, treaty of Nov. 16, 1805, and art. 13, treaty of June 22, 1855), $3,000; for permanent annuity for support of light horsemen (art. 13, treaty of Oct. 18, 1820, and art. 13, treaty of June 22, 1855), $600; for permanent annuity for support of blacksmith (art. 6, treaty of Oct. 18, 1820, and art. 9, treaty of Jan. 20, 1825, and art. 13, treaty of June 22, 1855), $600; for permanent annuity for education (art. 2, treaty of Jan. 20, 1825, and art. 13, treaty of June 22, 1855), $6,000; for permanent annuity for iron and steel (art. 9, treaty of January 20, 1825, and art. 13, treaty of June 22, 1855), $320; in all, $10,520.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice on page 33 of the report a list of permanent appropriations, and I find there "for construction, operation, and maintenance of irrigation system, $311,500." I wonder if the chairman can tell us how that comes in there?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman knows that these permanent appropriations set forth on page 33 of the report are not in this bill.

Mr. TABER. I so understand, but I am anxious to find out what happened that added that to the list of permanent appropriations.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will turn to page 700 of the hearings, he will find full information.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my pro forma amendment and offer it tomorrow.

The Clerk read to line 11, page 45, of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6951) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

THE FINANCIAL AND MONETARY SYSTEM

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules for printing under the rules.

The resolution is as follows:

House Resolution 227

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 6976, a bill to protect the currency of the United States, to provide for the better use of the monetary gold stock of the United States, and for other purposes, and all points of order against said bill or any provisions contained therein are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like unanimous consent to make a brief statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it proper in view of the general interest of the Membership in this resolution and this legislation, the gold bill, so called, to say that it is the purpose of the Democratic leadership to take the rule up for consideration immediately after the reading of the Journal on Saturday and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table. I believe it is the hope of the majority leader to conclude consideration of the bill if it is possible on Saturday.

I think it is proper to further say that this rule provides for the consideration of the bill under the general rules of the House with one exception, and that is that it waives points of order, on account of a direct appropriation which is the heart of the bill; otherwise it is open to any germane amendment.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have concluded my statement, but I will yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. I would like to know what time is allowed for general debate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. One hour on the rule and 3 hours' general debate, equally divided between the majority and the minority.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does that mean the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures or Banking and Currency Committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The control of the time will be in the hands of the Chairman of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and the ranking minority member, as is usual.

ADJOURNMENT

And then, on motion of Mr. BYRNS, at 4 o'clock and 2 minutes p.m., the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, January 19, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1934

(Legislative day of Thursday, Jan. 11, 1934)

The Senate met in executive session at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal for the calendar days of January 17 and January 18, 1934, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

A concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to extend credit to the farmers of this State through the crop and seed loan agency

Whereas the farm credit associations have been proven inadequate to meet the credit need of the farmers of this State in that the great majority of the landlords and tenant farmers are not in a position to meet the requirements of these associations and to furnish the financial statement exacted of them; and

Whereas the method of credit extended to the farmers directly through the crop and seed loan production agency requiring only a lien upon the current crops is best suited to the great majority of our crop producers and indispensable at this time: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That we petition the Congress through our Representatives to make available to our people the benefits of credit extended through the crop and seed loan agency, as provided for in the bill introduced by the Honorable E. D. SMITH, United States Senator and Chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the Senate.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Clerks of the respective branches of Congress and to each of the United States Senators and Members of Congress for the State.

IN THE SENATE,
Columbia, S.C., January 16, 1934.

I hereby certify that the foregoing and attached is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the senate and concurred in by the house of representatives.

VERA HOUSEAL,
Journal Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution relating to inadequate prices paid for piling by contractors on Federal jobs

Whereas the United States Government is constructing dams, locks, and spillways on the Mississippi River; and

Whereas the construction necessitates the use of thousands of 20- and 30-foot piling; and

Whereas contractors or subcontractors are now buying such piling by contracting with farmers; and

Whereas the reported prices offered for such piling are from $1 to $1.50 per pile, delivered on the highway; and

Whereas such prices will not adequately pay for the labor in cutting and delivering such pile, with no money allowed for the choice piece of timber; and

Whereas farmers are being taken advantage of, because of their dire need for funds, in the signing of such contracts: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature protests such action and asks that the Federal department having this construction in charge make proper investigation and assure to the farmer a reasonable price for his timber and labor; and further be it

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Wisconsin Member in both Houses of the Congress of the United States, requesting that they use their efforts to correct this apparent injustice.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE also presented the following joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing Congress to take immediate action to relieve the dairy industry from its present economic distress

Whereas the dairy industry, which formerly was one of the most prosperous of all of the industries of the Middle West, is now suffering untold hardships because of the tremendous increase of production and the equally great decrease in consumption of its products; and

Whereas the Department of Agriculture is at this time considering ways and means of bringing about higher prices to the producers of milk; and

Whereas this great industry, being the basic industry in many of our States, must be brought to a condition of profit before real and genuine prosperity can be restored to all of our people; and

Whereas, because of its wide-spread character, local or State legislation is powerless to effect its rehabilitation, it is of purely national concern and can be regenerated only by national measures undertaken by the National Government; and

Whereas statistics of the Department of Agriculture show that a per capita consumption of milk and milk products of 977 pounds of whole milk per annum is necessary today to keep pace with production, while in 1898 a per capita consumption of only 685 pounds disposed of all of the milk produced at that time; and

Whereas the facts and figures show that some kind of production control is necessary to lift the dairy industry out of its depressed condition; and

Whereas experience has demonstrated that it is impossible for the dairy farmer by or through his organization or associations to successfully bring about this control; and

Whereas a close cooperation between the dairy farmer and the National Government is necessary to the success of any plan for the economic restoration of the dairy industry; and

Whereas some plan is necessary in order to form a basis for legislation along these lines; and

Whereas the following plan is both feasible and practical:

Let the Congress pass an act providing for an appropriation and authorizing the President to set up a commission to carry out the provisions of the act. The act must provide for a division of all of the dairy regions of the country into districts or areas. In each such area, situated as near the center thereof as possible, there must be created one or more receiving stations under the authority of the commission. All milk produced in each district would be required to pass through the receiving station. No farmer would be allowed to sell any milk or cream except to the commission, and the commission would redistribute from the receiving station to all or any persons or corporations who wished to buy milk or cream in bulk; the buttermaker, the cheesemaker, the ice-cream manufacturer, the condenser, the whole-milk and cream distributor, the glue manufacturer, or anyone else would get his supplies from the central receiving stations. The act should declare milk production a public utility and authorize the commission to fix the price of milk, cream, or other dairy products, which price shall not be less than the cost of production. Surpluses could be destroyed or conserved, whichever, in the judgment of the commission, would be best for the industry. An absolute embargo on imports of milk and milk products and vegetable oils, casein, and other dairy substitutes would be necessary to make the plan a success.

The whole plan could be adequately financed by putting a tax of 2 cents per pound on all butterfat produced. This tax would produce nearly $100,000,000 annually. Control of production could follow after several months of experience, which would determine the production necessary to meet the consumer demand. The plan of production control would be devised by the commission; and

Whereas the above plan is tentative and suggested only as a basis for saving the dairy industry from self-destruction: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and are hereby, respectfully requested to give very careful consideration to the plan outlined above; and be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Department of Agriculture at Washington and to our Representatives and Senators in the Congress of the United States.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution urging the Secretary of Agriculture and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration of the United States to consider certain proposals for the relief of the dairy industry

Whereas the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has provided bonuses totaling over one half billion dollars for agricultural communities in the Corn and Hog Belt, the Wheat Belt, and the Cotton Belt, but nothing whatever as yet has been provided for the dairy industry; and

Whereas of this total amount $350,000,000 will be allotted in corn and hog bonuses and about $160,000,000 each in wheat and cotton bonuses; and

Whereas the dairy industry is in a serious condition, vitally affecting Wisconsin, the leading dairy State in the Union, and its people; and

Whereas Wisconsin and other dairy States are lagging behind in recovery because no relief has been provided to rehabilitate and stabilize the dairy industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That this legislature respectfully urges the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration to give serious and prompt consideration to a program for relief to the dairy industry, and respectfully requests the national administration particularly to consider the following proposals as a part of its program for Federal farm relief:

1. A production-control program that will bring dairy production somewhere near to being in line with effective consumer demand.

2. In connection with this basic program, a supplementary program that will tend to take existing surpluses of dairy products off the market and increase the price of dairy products to whatever extent effective consumer demand will permit.

3. A subsidiary program to check the imports of so-called "manufactured" cream, vegetable oils, and casein and to provide an adequate internal tax on all butter substitutes; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, Hon. Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture and Federal Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, and to each Representative and Senator from Wisconsin in the Congress of the United States.

C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to adopt certain proposed measures for agricultural relief

Whereas the Wisconsin Legislature has during the present and past recent sessions memorialized Congress to adopt numerous measures for agricultural relief; and

Whereas many of the measures enacted by Congress and put into operation by the Secretary of Agriculture are merely intended for temporary relief of the farmers; and

Whereas some of these so-called "temporary measures" appear not to be accomplishing their purpose, as is apparent from the fact that the recent processing tax on hogs has driven the price of hogs down to unprecedented levels; and

Whereas one of the reasons given for the recent drop of 2½ cents a pound in the price of American cheese is the anticipation of a possible processing tax on cheese; and

Whereas many of the other measures proposed as a solution of the farm problem are admittedly only a temporary solution of the problem; and

Whereas the Wisconsin Legislature reaffirms its approval of drastic measures which will afford even temporary relief, especially to the dairy farmer; and

Whereas more permanent measures are necessary for the ultimate relief of the farmers from the present crushing burden which, if continued, will lead to eventual economic slavery: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of Wisconsin hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to adopt the following measures for agricultural relief:

1. The Frazier bill providing for the Government refinancing farmers at a rate of 1½-percent interest.

2. The Swank-Thomas bill providing for the Government regulation of the marketing of farm crops on a basis of the farmer receiving for that portion of his crop needed for domestic consumption a price of not less than cost of production, including a reasonable profit.

3. The Wheeler bill providing for the remonetization of silver.

4. Prohibition of gambling or speculating in foodstuffs and other agricultural products by governmental regulation of boards of trade and similar private organizations.

5. Tariff equality for farmers as compared with other groups; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be sent to President Roosevelt, Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace, both Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to each Representative and Senator from Wisconsin.

THOMAS J. O'MALLEY,
President of the Senate.
R. A. COBBAN,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. T. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
JOHN J. SLOCUM,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

THE WORLD COURT

As in legislative session,

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I send to the desk two editorials from the evening journal, Every Evening, a daily newspaper of Wilmington, Del., under date of Saturday, January 6, 1934, which I request to be inserted in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the editorials were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the evening journal, Every Evening, Jan. 6, 1934]

PLAYING THE OLD GAME

Senator ROBINSON, Democratic leader in the United States Senate, is responsible for the statement that the Roosevelt administration has decided to sidetrack the World Court adherence protocol and that it has been wiped off the Senate legislative program for the present session of Congress.

"We feel that the situation in Europe is so complex", asserts the Democratic Senate leader, "that it is not an opportune time to proceed with the World Court resolution. Busy with his domestic recovery campaign, President Roosevelt has given no time to the World Court problem."

And there we have it again—the same old game of playing battledore and shuttlecock with one of the most important pieces of proposed legislation that has been before the United States Senate in many years. It is a disgrace that this is so, because American sentiment is overwhelmingly in favor of the World Court resolution and adherence; both the great political parties are pledged to such adherence by unequivocal platform planks, and Democrats and Republicans in the Senate should feel themselves bound by those planks.

Instead of putting the resolution through, the Democratic United States Senate follows the policy of its predecessor, a Republican United States Senate, and makes an Orphan Annie of it, greatly to the indignation of the American people, who feel that adherence by the United States to the World Court would be a splendid piece of political policy for either of the great parties to sponsor and make effective.

The revised protocol for American adherence to the World Court was transmitted to the Senate by President Hoover in December 1930. It was sidetracked by the Republicans then. If the statement just made by Senator ROBINSON be sustained by events, it has been sidetracked by the Democrats now and has no place on their program for the present session.

Both parties have suffered in public esteem as a result of their common attitude toward the adherence resolution. What they have done will react unfavorably upon them. They have shown that important party-platform planks often are made to the public ear, to be broken to the public hope.

The World Court protocols have been kept in the Senate Foreign Relations Committee year after year despite negotiation of agreements to take care of most of the original amendments proposed in the Senate and despite the proposal of an additional reservation to prevent an advisory opinion by the Court in a case in which the United States might be interested. Opposition to Court membership, always vigorous in the Senate, is thought by Senate leaders to have increased recently with the impasse over world disarmament, the presence of war clouds in Europe as well as the Orient, and the departure of Japan and Germany from the League of Nations.

WORLD COURT A PERTINENT ISSUE

The reconvening of Congress for its new session again focuses attention upon the question of proposed American adherence to the World Court. This proposal has been before the country in some form for nearly 11 years.

The resolution providing for our adherence to the Court, with the Hughes reservations, was first sent to the Senate in February 1923. The resolution providing for adherence, if five reservations should be met, was passed by the Senate in January 1926. The vote was overwhelming, being 76 to 17, and, we believe, accurately reflected national sentiment.

The three pending Court treaties were signed by Executive authority in 1929, after the Department of State had declared that they fully met the Senate's 1926 reservations. Ratification of the treaties was one of the preferred measures on the Senate Calendar at the last session of Congress but, nevertheless, was passed over.

Completion of adherence of the United States to the World Court is recommended by both major party platforms of 1932. These declarations, it would seem, make affirmative action obligatory upon all Members of the Senate who owe allegiance to either of the major parties, particularly those who were elected on the 1932 platforms.

Ratification of the three treaties is believed to be part of the administration's program. Therefore, we can see no legitimate obstacles to affirmative action early in the new session of Congress.

It is not unlikely, however, that the contention may be made that urgent domestic legislation makes it illogical to deal with a remote issue like the World Court at this time, as it has been in previous years, as a pretext for deferring action. This impresses us as untenable ground.

In our opinion it is not straining a point to maintain that if the United States, by adhering to the World Court, clearly endorses the principle of judicial settlement, where that principle is applicable, that endorsement would contribute to the sense of security and stability upon which, in the long run, world-wide recovery must depend.

The question of endorsing one practicable substitute for war is hardly to be considered remote in a period when most of the nations of the earth are still struggling under the burden of paying for the last war.

Regardless of how crowded a Senate session may be with business, experience has shown that there always is time for consideration of a question like the World Court issue in the early weeks of the session when other urgent legislation still is in process of preparation in committee.

The treaties involved are again in the hands of the Foreign Relations Committee. They were reported to the Senate in June 1932, but not having been acted upon by the last Congress they have been returned, automatically, to the committee, which must report them again with a new resolution of ratification before the Senate can take action.

There is, of course, the possibility of the employment of dilatory tactics, both in committee and on the floor of the Senate, as has been done heretofore. However, the old ammunition used in this connection, sometimes as a subterfuge, has been worn threadbare; and unless some new and apparently logical schemes can be invented, obviously dilatory tactics engineered by opponents are not likely to deter friends of the proposal in such efforts as they may desire to make toward final disposition of the World Court issue.

As we see the matter, it is the duty of the friends of adherence to use their influence and numerical strength to get the question before the Senate and bring it to a vote as soon as possible. Actual difficulties have been met and overcome, and we can conceive of no excuse for further delay.

HOG BUYING THROUGH OPEN COMPETITIVE TERMINAL MARKETS

As in legislative session,

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I present several petitions from Kansas Farmers Union locals, urging passage of legislation to require packers to buy hogs through open competitive terminal markets, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

While I have the floor I want to say that it is high time Congress took action to curb the abuses of the direct buying of livestock by packers. Some 5 years ago, when the packers were just starting their private stockyards, I introduced a bill to place them under the control of the Secretary of Agriculture to the same extent that the public terminal yards are under control and regulation.

It was plain to many of us then that the private packer-owned yards, plus the concentration points that have since been developed, could and would be used to manipulate prices on the public markets where the prices are made. And that is just what has happened. Packers have hogs shipped to them direct. These supplies in their own private yards allow the packers to stay off entirely or limit their purchases in the public markets thereby depressing the market prices. Then the hogs held in their own yards are paid for at the lower market prices which the use of the concentration points and private packer-owned yards have helped to create.

It is not my intention to trespass upon the time of the Senate today to discuss this problem, but I just want to call attention to it and serve notice that it is the intention to press for action on S. 2133, which directs the Secretary of Agriculture to designate as terminal livestock markets all such yards which have been determined to have an effect upon market prices.

The petitions which I present and ask to have referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry are from the Ohio Farmers Union, Local No. 1456, of Arkansas City; citizens of Riley, Dickinson, Marshall, Nemaha, McPherson, and Stafford Counties, and of Farlington and Hiattville, all in the State of Kansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petitions will be received and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

HONEST INFLATION—ARTICLE BY EDWARD TUCK (S.DOC. NO. 115)

As in legislative session,

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a public document an article that appeared in Scribner's Magazine for January 1934, entitled "Honest Inflation", by Edward Tuck.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that that article was put in the RECORD on the second day of the session.

Mr. WHEELER. I am asking to have it made a public document.

Mr. Tuck is the founder of the Tuck School of Business Administration at Dartmouth College and one of the leading experts and financiers in the United States. This is one of the very ablest articles that I have seen written upon the monetary question in recent years.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE PRESIDENT'S MONETARY POLICIES AND TAX LEGISLATION—RADIO ADDRESS BY SENATOR HARRISON

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD a speech made during the National Radio Forum and broadcast on January 17 by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on the subject of the President's Monetary Policies and Tax Legislation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When Mr. Kuhn and his associates extended to me an invitation to address you tonight I was enjoined to speak upon the financial condition of the country and likely tax legislation during this session. However, the President's unexpected monetary pronouncement to the Congress on Monday invites me tonight to deviate for the moment from what I had expected to say and to discuss with you briefly the President's gold policy and the reaction of the Congress to it.

When President Roosevelt was inducted into the White House on the 4th of March last year he was determined upon inaugurating such policies and adopting such plans as would restore a more just equilibrium between the purchasing value of commodities and the value of the American dollar. It was obvious to him, as it was to the American people, that commodity and land values had declined out of proportion to the value of the American dollar and that unless and until a fair ratio could be reestablished it would be impossible to restore economic contentment and stability to our people.

With that single object in view, he has suggested many legislative measures for the relief of the debtor, all of which have been enacted into law with beneficient effect. The recent gold pronouncement of the President is but another step toward the goal which he has sought to reach. This Government will always continue to fix its circulating medium upon a metallic base. There will never be a time when gold will not be the major basis upon which this Government will issue currency. We may add to the base, but gold will never be discarded as one of the bases of currency. That being true, our Government is in an enviable position, because today we hold $4,000,000,000 of gold, and, together with one other country, control more than 60 percent of the gold supply of the world. Through the purchase of gold in the world market and the purchase of newly mined gold within the country we have been able to devalue the American dollar to about 63 cents. The President has felt that it should go lower than that, and during the recent session of Congress he was given the power to reduce the gold content of the dollar to as low as 50 percent.

The President believes, and rightfully so, that the Government should control and possess the gold supply of the country. Already, under authority given him by Congress, he has compelled individuals and corporations to surrender the gold in their possession, for which lawful money has been paid.

In our Federal Reserve System there is now held about two and one half billions of dollars in gold. The President feels that this agency should surrender its gold as have other American institutions and citizens. The Federal Reserve System will lose nothing thereby. The Government will issue to these banks the same character of gold certificates which it has issued to its citizens. When the value of the American dollar is stabilized, as in all probability it will be under international agreement, this Government will obtain considerable profit for the American people, as it should obtain from the devaluation process. If in the end the American dollar is stabilized at 60 cents, the Treasury of the United States will be benefited in the amount of two and two thirds billions of dollars. If the stabilization is at 50 cents, the profit will be four billions of dollars.

There has been some fear manifested by certain groups of our people over the fluctuations in value of our dollar. To remove that fear, so that business may go forward without hesitation, the President has clearly set forth in his message to the Congress—and the Congress will so legislate—that he cannot devalue the dollar at a higher price than 60 cents. It is a most constructive suggestion that he be permitted when the time is ripe to stabilize the dollar within the range of 50 and 60 cents valuation. With that power granted to the President, we can be assured that favorable exchange balances will be obtained, that our exports will continue to increase, and that American interests will be protected abroad. Of course, in the end this large accumulation of profits, amounting to several billions of dollars, will be employed in reducing the Nation's indebtedness. But for the time being, a large part of it can be used to the Government's advantage in an equalization fund, as suggested in the President's message, to protect American exchange, to restrict the climb of the dollar upward, and to combat foreign agencies which are working against our monetary policies for their own benefit. There is nothing exceptional in this suggestion, because we are only doing what England and France have already done. For a very long time England has kept active a fund of more than $1,800,000,000 to be used in influencing the value of the pound sterling or the American dollar throughout the British Empire as it sees fit to do.

This latest move of the President will not only restore a better equilibrium between commodity prices and land values and the American dollar, and will not only ultimately place several billion dollars in the United States Treasury, but it will open new opportunities in enlarged fields for the sale of our surplus products and will hasten a stabilization understanding and give assurance and confidence to business and investments. Of course, there is some opposition to the President's suggestions. Some will feel that the member banks of the Federal Reserve System should retain for themselves the profit on this gold, others will cry out constitutional inhibitions and raise legal technicalities; but in the Congress the President's message was received with acclaim, and legislation incorporating his suggestions into law will be passed at a very early date.

Aside from the advantages that are apparent and the assurance of a reduction in our national debt, there are other reasons why the American people should feel encouraged by this bold and constructive stroke of the President. Our financial structure is sound. Timid souls were somewhat alarmed when recently the President transmitted to the Congress his Budget message, stating that the Government would have to borrow approximately $6,000,000,000 in the next 6 months. It was a very frank message. It was typical of the President, who believes that the best way to win and to hold the confidence of the American people is to give them the picture, good or bad; to withhold nothing from them—because we are all parties with him in this great fight for economic recovery.

The very large deficit revealed in the President's message is due to the extraordinary and unprecedented emergency expenditures made necessary by the deplorable condition of our country. This condition was not of the President's making. It existed when he became our Chief Executive. I am not offering criticism of the past administration, but I do know that a most difficult and distressing situation confronted all of us.

The President believed that it would be better to put people to work than to grant doles; that it would be better to expend money for public construction for the benefit of the people than to have our citizens starve from hunger or die from want of warmth and shelter. He believed that it would be better to utilize our great resources—even at the cost of an increased national debt—if in doing so the great banking system of the country could be saved and security and hope given to the depositing public. He believed that by emergency expenditures for agriculture, if we might increase to some fair price the products of the farm, the entire country would be enriched. So it was that to combat exceptional conditions these large expenditures were made and our national debt increased.

Even though taxes now are numerous and heavy, one thing is sure—the American people have received more benefit, have experienced and witnessed more relief through Government expenditures one way and another from these taxes than ever before in the history of the country. Then, too, even though the national debt has climbed, and will continue to do so in this emergency, we are assured in the fact that because of these expenditures and this debt increase we have been able to destroy the depression and to sustain values, so that today American holdings, whether in property, commodities, or securities, have increased to many times more than the amount of the deficit incurred since March 4 of last year.

Then, too, it must not be forgotten that much of these Government advances will be returned to the Government. The hundreds of millions loaned on homes and farms and to banks, whether in the taking of preferred stock or in direct loans, to insurance companies, cities, towns, and States for public improvements will largely be repaid. While there is a deficit our Budget shows a healthy and sound condition. During the past 6 months the ordinary expenditures have been less by $2,000,000 than have Government receipts. Today revenues are sufficient to meet the ordinary expenditures of the Government. For the last 6 months total revenues have been about 43 percent greater than for the corresponding 6-month period of the last fiscal year.

Assume that every advancement made by the Government—whether in the form of loans or what not, amounting to several billions of dollars—is lost. And no one contends that. Assume that the Government through the latest gold move upon the part of the President will not receive the billions of dollars estimated as profit from the devaluation of the dollar. And no one contends that. Assume that our national debt will be increased before this emergency is overcome to slightly more than 30 billions of dollars. We can then by limiting the period to even 25 years liquidate that indebtedness through an annual sinking fund requirement of three fourths of a billion dollars a year with an interest rate of 3½ percent. In that case ordinary expenditures and debt retirement will amount to approximately three and one half billions of dollars. Why, from 1920 to 1924 the total annual revenue to the Government averaged four and three fourths billion dollars. This is one and one fourth billion dollars in excess of the amount that might be required for our ordinary expenditures and debt retirement under the most unfavorable interpretation.

We are very much encouraged, and I hope you will be, when I explain our present tax situation and the yield we hope to obtain without increasing the present burden. There are many reasons for this optimism.

First, the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the recent rate increases on alcoholic liquors give a new and prolific source of revenue. Second, our special sales taxes nearly all show marked increases in productivity, indicating beyond question greater volume of sales. Third, all reports indicate not only greater volume of sales for 1933 than for 1932 but also greater profits.

Government experts estimate that the total consumption of distilled spirits will amount to 140 million gallons annually. We have placed a tax of $2 per gallon on distilled spirits and from that item we expect to obtain 280 million dollars annually. But that is not all. About 25 million gallons of the 140 million will be imported, and the $5 per gallon customs duty on that amount will bring 125 million dollars of revenue in addition to the internal revenue tax. From occupational taxes and from the tax on rectified spirits, the Government will obtain about 37 millions of dollars additional. This will make a total on distilled spirits of 442 million dollars. The gallonage taxes and duties on wines and the occupational taxes in connection therewith should yield 25 million dollars annually. This amount added to the revenue from distilled spirits will give us a total of 467 million dollars of new revenue. Adding this total to the 160 million dollars which we expect to receive from the beer taxes, we have a grand total revenue from these alcoholic beverages of 627 million dollars.

As an illustration of how business is improving let me give you the increases of a few of the important excise taxes during the last 6 months over the corresponding 6-month period of last year. Estate-tax receipts have increased 190 percent. Stock-transfer tax receipts have increased 43 percent. Tax receipts on automobiles, trucks, and accessories have increased 184 percent. Tax receipts on toilet preparations have increased 30 percent, and tax receipts on tobacco products have increased 2½ percent.

The total of internal-revenue receipts, exclusive of income and processing taxes, has increased from $388,000,000 for the corresponding 6-month period of last year to $742,000,000 for the last 6 months. This is an increase of 91 percent. Government estimates are that income-tax receipts for the fiscal year 1934 will be $117,000,000 more than for the fiscal year 1933, and that income-tax receipts for 1935 will be $518,000,000 more than for the fiscal year 1933. If we look forward to the fiscal year 1935, which begins July 1 this year, I believe that governmental revenues for that period will exceed by $2,000,000,000 the revenues for 1933.

We expect to pass another tax measure during this session of Congress. It will deal largely with the administrative features of the income-tax law. Its object will be to prevent evasion of tax payments. Today a person of substantial wealth, instead of paying the surtaxes on his income, oftentimes avoids such surtaxes by incorporating his holdings and allowing such corporation to receive the income from his investments.

In this way only the corporate tax is paid, and the individual pays no surtaxes unless the corporation makes a distribution of dividends. This law will be amended so as to prevent the avoidance of surtaxes by the accumulation of corporate surpluses. We expect also to obtain considerable additional revenue from income taxes by preventing losses sustained from the sale of capital assets from being charged off against ordinary income. Under the present law great chains of corporations have been built up and capital structures pyramided without the payment of taxes. The theory has been that the tax is postponed. Practice has shown that in most cases the tax is indefinitely postponed. These provisions of the law must be rewritten and restricted in such a manner as to prevent tax avoidance.

We do not intend to make any increases in the existing tax rates and no new taxes are contemplated. We realized that some profit must be left to the individual and corporation from the operations of their business, or else all incentive to engage in business will disappear, but we will endeavor by appropriate legislation to make every person pay his fair share of tax based on his true net income, whether that person be an individual or a corporation.

To me the most pleasing part of the situation is that we are well on the road to recovery. Already four taxes imposed last year, amounting to $227,000,000, have been eliminated as a result of the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. Just as soon as the condition of the Treasury will permit, we will carry forward a further plan of tax reduction. Improved business will be the greatest factor in bringing increased revenue to the Government. Improvement in business is no longer a mere hope; it is an evident fact. We are winning the fight and the victory will soon be ours. The Congress should be sustained by the American people, and the President deserves their united cooperation.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S.Res. 111) submitted by Mr. CONNALLY on the 4th instant, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with amendments, in line 2, after the word "employ", to insert the words "for the remainder of the session of the Senate", and in line 5, after the words "per annum", to strike out the words "until otherwise provided by law", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds hereby is authorized to employ for the remainder of the session of the Senate an assistant clerk to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate at the rate of $2,000 per annum.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

As in legislative session,

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 6181) to control the manufacture, transportation, possession, and sale of alcoholic beverages in the District of Columbia.

TRANSFER OF GOLD FROM FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

As in legislative session,

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, inasmuch as consideration of the bill to seize the gold of the Federal Reserve banks is being considered in secret executive session by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, but by reason of the fact that the opinion presented by the Attorney General as to the constitutionality of the bill was authorized to be given to the public, I desire to put into the RECORD a statement bearing upon the constitutionality of the bill which the Attorney General, I suppose inadvertently, omitted from his opinion.

The Attorney General, in his opinion, referred to the case of Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States ((1892) 148 U.S. 312, 327), but he appears to have omitted a very vital part of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. I read from the opinion of the Court in the case of Monongahela Navigation Co. against the United States:

By this legislation Congress seems to have assumed the right to determine what shall be the measure of compensation. But this is a judicial and not a legislative question. The legislature may determine what private property is needed for public purposes—that is a question of political and legislative character—but when the taking has been ordered, then the question of compensation is judicial. It does not rest with the public, taking the property, through Congress or the legislature, its representative, to say what compensation shall be paid, or even what shall be the rule of compensation. The Constitution has declared that just compensation shall be paid, and the ascertainment of that is a judicial inquiry.

Again in United States against New River Collieries, being a case that came up from my own State in 1922, recorded in Two Hundred and Sixty-second United States Reports, at pages 343–344, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

The ascertainment of compensation is a judicial function, and no power exists in any other department of the Government to declare what the compensation shall be or to prescribe any binding rule in that regard (citing Monongahela Navigation Co. v. United States, 148 U.S. 312, 327).

I simply want to put those quotations in the RECORD so that the press may have access to them.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I did not understand whether the Senator from Virginia asked to have incorporated in the RECORD the opinion of the Attorney General.

Mr. GLASS. I did not, but it has been given to the public and has been printed textually in all the newspapers of the country.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, in executive session and as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that for a moment?

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was informed that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] expected to take the floor and discuss the treaty. Manifestly the Senate is not ready to vote on the treaty. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that he proceed if he is ready to do so.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am ready to proceed.

Mr. KING. Very well; I withdraw the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in discussing the treaty I think we should bear in mind two things, among others. I have had placed on the wall of the Chamber a map of the United States. The economic benefits to accrue to the inland part of the United States if the treaty is ratified and the keyway is open to transportation to the inland part of the United States have been gone into quite fully. However, I ask Senators to visualize with me the distance from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic coast, approximately 2,000 miles, and practically the same distance to the Pacific coast. No one will deny that from that part of the country to the eastern territory the agricultural and other products produced in the Mississippi Valley must pay and sustain the transportation charges to point of consumption. The same is true with reference to shipments to the west coast.

In 1920 the Congress enacted the Esch-Cummins law, later called "the Transportation Act." As a result of the enactment of that law we have had freight rates in the central territory raised from 40 to 100 percent. Those increased freight rates not only apply on agricultural products shipped from the Mississippi Valley to the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, but they apply likewise to goods shipped from those coasts to the interior. Of course, the freight rates and the increases in the freight rates are added to the ultimate cost to the consumer. On the other hand, when we ship, we ship grain either to the Atlantic or the Pacific coast or to Europe at a price based upon the price it will receive at point of delivery, so we pay the freight rate both ways.

With that increase in freight rates under the Transportation Act of 1920, the result is revealed in the census report of 1930. That census report shows that we have lost enough population to cost the Mississippi Valley 17 Members in the lower House of Congress, and the coast States have gained 25 Members of the lower House of Congress. There has been a flight of population and a flight of industry and capital from the bread basket of the country to water transportation. Industry cannot compete here. The economic conditions, largely on account of transportation charges both for agriculture and for industry, make it necessary for industry to move, and population follows industry in order to get employment.

This will open a water route in competition with the Mississippi inland waterways system to every port in the United States and give us the benefit of competitive rates and of the Panama Canal.

On the floor of the Senate objection has been made on the ground that foreign ships will come into these harbors on a basis of equality, of course. I beg you to remember the same rules govern the entrance of ships into the ports of any civilized country in the world. Our ships have the same privilege in every harbor in the world. Of course, when we go through Canadian waters we will be subject to the rules and regulations imposed upon that commerce by Canada, and we submit to like rules and regulations in whatever country we enter, whether upon its shores, on the ocean, or upon the rivers. I cannot see why an objection should be raised on that score. If it is dangerous and undesirable to have foreign ships come into these ports, by that logic we should shut every port on every coast to foreign ships.

Objection has been raised here on the floor of the Senate because of the possibility of the British high-sea fleet coming up the St. Lawrence River in case of war and entering the Great Lakes system. If that is to be taken seriously, I should say that if the British high-sea fleet should come up there in case of war with us, I do not know of a better place in the world in which to lock it up; and I give the British Admiralty credit for having more sense than to try anything like that.

It is estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission and various other authorities that the traffic here will be 80 percent domestic traffic, coastwise traffic. Therefore, under the law, that traffic will have to be carried in American bottoms. I think it is safe to assume that we will get our share of carrying freight to foreign ports.

This will open the competitive territory along every coast to the inland part of the country to competition with water traffic on the Mississippi system. The Army engineers, in conducting the economic survey, stated in an official report that neither this waterway nor the other waterway would give full potential benefit to the people of the country without having the two waterways, so as to have competitive traffic. The system of waterways here now—a magnificent system of waterways—does not give to the people of our part of the country the full benefit that they ought to have.

The people who control the coal mines, the railroads, the ships on the Lakes, and the iron mines of Michigan and Minnesota are all interrelated. They take the coal from their own mines, haul it on their own railroads, ship it on their own ships to the various ports throughout the Middle West, and retail it to their own subsidiary companies. It is, for all practical purposes, a closed monopoly. If we can get a competitive waterway here—I do not intend to talk about the Mississippi Valley system except in relation to the waterway to the sea—so as to get a competitive traffic by water to the Middle West, the Middle West will have the full benefit of the two seaways.

Objection has been made, it is said, to the changed status of Lake Michigan under this treaty. I ventured to offer the information yesterday, and I will repeat it today, that the status which Lake Michigan had under the treaty of 1909 is changed in only two respects, and in my opinion the changes are beneficial to the people of both Canada and the United States.

In the treaty of 1909 Lake Michigan was thrown open for navigation to Canadian ships. The question of diversion of water remains the same as under the treaty of 1909, with the exception of the diversion at Chicago. The treaty of 1909 makes no provision for settlement of the dispute regarding water diversion at that point.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there? I do not want to interrupt the trend of his argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. If I may at that point interrupt for a moment, the Senator, of course, will recall that in the treaty of 1909 no settlement was made of the question of diversion because the United States, under the leadership of Mr. Secretary of State Elihu Root, refused to consider in the negotiations the question of the diversion at Chicago, on the ground that Lake Michigan neither came within the definition of boundary waters nor within the definition of tributary waters. In other words, the United States Government maintained the proposition that the subject was not open to discussion, because we had a right to take what we pleased and refused to consider the question in the negotiation of that treaty.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The high contracting parties recognized that a controversy existed. They also said that each country reserved to itself the right to protest against any diversion, and each country also reserved to itself the right to recover damages sustained by diversion of water from one watershed to another. It is true that the matter was not settled. This treaty provides for a settlement, or a method of settlement.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. This treaty provides, under article VIII, for settlement by limitation in perpetuity of the diversion from Lake Michigan, but under article VI permits diversions in perpetuity by Canada from Georgian Bay.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I believe there is a provision that in case an emergency shall arise, the matter shall be left to arbitration.

Mr. CLARK. That is perfectly true; but, if I may interrupt the Senator a moment longer—and I do not wish to take his time—I am not now speaking of emergencies, to which the provision referred to by the Senator has reference. I am speaking of ordinary diversions for permanent purposes of navigation by the United States in the one case or by Canada in the other.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think that subject has been pretty well thrashed out on the floor of the Senate, and there is not much use in going over it again, with all due respect to the Senator from Missouri.

Here is another point of difference: The treaty of 1909 can be terminated in 1 year. Under this treaty the provision for the use of Lake Michigan by Canadian ships is made permanent, the same as in a treaty prior to that of 1909—I believe the treaty of 1871—the St. Lawrence River was made usable by American ships forever. Under this treaty the same provision is made for Canadian ships in Lake Michigan.

Next, objection has been made to this treaty because of the fact that we will spend some money on the Canadian side, and we will have property on the Canadian side owned by the American Government. I think that statement was made.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. I think the statement has been made, not that there would be property on the Canadian side owned by the United States Government, but that there would be property on the Canadian side paid for by the United States Government and constructed under the provisions of the treaty with Canadian labor, Canadian materials, and Canadian engineers. So far as I am concerned, I have never heard the suggestion made that anybody contended that the United States would own any of the property on the Canadian side, because that suggestion is specifically negatived in the treaty; but it does provide that there will be a lot of property on the Canadian side paid for by the United States.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I think the Senator is correct as to that. I simply mentioned the fact; but that property will be for the use of the United States as well as of Canada. There may be, in some people's minds, an objection to that. I cannot see it. This is money spent for the benefit of the two countries; and certainly the country to the north has been in the most friendly relations with us.

For instance, take the Rhine. That is an international river in Europe. Money is spent by various governments for their own use and for the use of other governments or their nationals and their transportation in connection with the navigation of the Rhine. We have the right to use in Canadian territory the Yukon River, and they have the right to use the Yukon in our territory, but all must be subject to the regulation and police power of the respective countries. There is nothing new in that.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, is it true that the major part of the expense of the construction would be in the international section of the river?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. What does the Senator mean by the international section?

Mr. COPELAND. The section between Lake Ontario and Cornwall, 166 miles, is the only part of the river bordering directly on the United States. That is known as the international section. I think that was referred to a moment ago by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have the exact figures as to the expenditures.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator will find that the major part of the expenditure is to be in the international section, and I think what the Senator from Missouri had in mind was that in that section the large part of the construction would be in Canadian territory, and under the treaty provision is made that wherever the construction is in Canadian territory, the work shall be done under the supervision of Canadian engineers, by Canadian labor, and with Canadian materials.

I think the point which the Senator had in mind was that this would be largely a project for the relief of unemployment in Canada, because there would be spent in that section, as I remember, about $200,000,000; and a large part of that would be in Canada, wholly at the expense of the United States, even the arrangement about compensation in the event of injuries to workers. So a large part of the expenditure for the project would be in Canadian territory, paid for by American money. I think that is perhaps what the Senator from Missouri had in mind.

Mr. CLARK. That was precisely the point.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not doubt that that is part of the investment we make in order to get the necessary results we expect to get and with the expenditures necessary to be made. Because they have to be made in Canada, I think it is reasonable that they be made that way. If they were to be made in the United States, I think that we would want the same regulation.

When we built the Panama Canal it also furnished temporary employment for people not citizens of the United States. The Panama Canal was built mostly by the labor of the people from the West Indies. I do not think that affected our investment in the Panama Canal or any results which have come to the people of the United States, even though to our detriment in the middle portion of our country. We are perfectly willing that the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts shall have the benefit of the Panama Canal, but we want relief from the handicap which the Government placed upon our part of the country when they built the Panama Canal, starting the migration—also partly the result of the Esch-Cummings law—from the inland part of the country to the coast. We cannot permit such a national economic policy to continue, because the more people and the more industry leave this part of the country the less there is to stay for, and the more people will leave; and if all our people moved to the coast, the people on the coast could not expect to make a living and to support the country by taking in each other's washing.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator has admirably stated the grounds for my objection to this treaty. I entirely agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the construction of the Panama Canal, unless there be adequate development of the inland waterways of the United States, will prove to have been—and, in effect, already has proven to have been, so far as the people of the Mississippi Valley are concerned—the greatest calamity that ever befell any large section of the habitable globe. But the St. Lawrence project, while it would benefit the Senator's State and the northern end of the Mississippi Valley, perhaps, by its limitation in perpetuity on the diversion of water from Lake Michigan, is designed forever to shut off the peoples of the lower valley from access to the sea.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I intend to cover that matter.

Mr. CLARK. I apologize to the Senator. I had not intended to interrupt him at such length.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will cover that part of the problem, too; but I am trying to make these remarks as chronological as I can.

I want to refer again to the objection to foreign ships coming in here.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he presses that point?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator spoke of the benefit that would be brought to the people of the Northwest by the building of the canal. Would not the same benefit accrue to the people there if the canal were built through New York State?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have no doubt. I am not familiar with the engineering problems in connection with the so-called "New York State Canal", and the water power available if that route were followed.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not pressing the matter at all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. When the various commissions made reports upon the two projects I tried to study the report as to the effect of the St. Lawrence waterway, because that was the one recommended; and I have not had the time to give to a study of the New York channel project, and I do not care to inject that into the debate, because we are now debating the St. Lawrence waterway.
